THE war in Europe had scarcely been declared, when the price of food in this country was rapidly advanced by persons who claimed that such advance was rendered necessary by the war. The advance was so widespread in the nation and the extortioners so insistent and the oppression of the poor so burdensome that the national, State and municipal authorities instituted vigorous investigations to discover the miscreants and punish them. It would hardly be thought credible that avarice would so possess men's souls as to prompt them to profit by others' misfortunes. The salutary effect of these investigations is being recognized in the reduction of the prices of meat and other articles of food. The investigating committees have also been hunting down those who have been giving light weight and short measures in the sale of products, and are striking terror to the evil-doers who practice one kind of fraud or other upon the people. Such malefactors are thus graphically described:

Thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbors by extortion, and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God. (Ezek. 22: 12.)

Kidnappers Receive Heavy Sentence

THE largest band of kidnappers that has operated in and about New York for many years has just been broken up. An Italian boy eight years old had been stolen and kept for forty-nine days, while his distracted father received letters demanding a large sum of money, and threats that the child's body would be sent him piecemeal by post. The district attorney's office succeeded in taking and convicting the leaders in the crime. The one who was characterized as the brains of the gang was recently sentenced to a term of from twenty-five to fifty years in Sing Sing prison. Penalties of twelve and a half to twenty years and twenty to thirty years have been imposed upon other conspirators, and six others are now awaiting trial in connection with this case. In most States very heavy penalties are imposed for this crime, and the penalties are very generally inflicted. A strong sentence rigidly executed against these foul criminals has a salutary influence upon the morals of the community. The ill effect of light penalties poorly enforced is thus expressed:

Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. (Eccles. 8: 11.)

Destructive Forest Fires Raging

WITH 1,000 forest fire-fighters battling in the national forests of Montana and northern Idaho, fifty uncontrolled fires burning, and weather conditions more threatening than at any time since the great fires of 1910, the forest officials say that the situation is grave. Over 2,000 fires have been fought this season. Conditions are also reported as serious in the Black Hills of South Dakota, and parts of Wyoming. In Northern California fire was recently fought for days by a force gathered from far and near by the Forest Service, until 1,000 men were fighting the flames. In Oregon fire is threatening the national forest watershed upon which the city of Portland depends for its water supply. Loss of lives has been reported from several points. There is this reference to the destruction of trees by fire:

O Lord, to thee will I cry: for the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness, and the flame hath burned all the trees of the field. (Joel 1: 19.)

READY AND UNREADY*

The Ten Virgins

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

RAILROADS do not hang out the red light of warning when there is no danger. Neither does Christ. If there had been no need of watching, working and preparing, he "would have told you." The foolish virgins were not prepared for emergencies. They lost their chance by sleeping, by having no oil. If a general fails in the supreme crisis of a battle, it is as great a failure as if he were defeated in the beginning. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link. One only has as much grace as he can command in trial. Instead of saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" we should heed the words, "Be ye also ready."

Be busy waiting and watching. Idly looking out of the windows for the return of your Lord when you should be at the post of duty is sinful. One might as well be asleep on the picket line as only gazing. "Wakeful work" should be our motto.

Lost opportunities. We are to seize time by the forelock, for he is bald behind. Neglecting time or killing time makes life a failure, and there is no bribing death to extend the privilege. Golden opportunities improved mean golden glories enjoyed. One may redeem time lost by buying up new opportunities with increased devotion.

The loving desire for the Bridegroom will make Christ first in everything. "Lovest thou me more than these?" More than ease, sleep, riches, honors and self? When you love his appearing with burning desire, you will watch as you work and wait, and be ready when you hear "Behold, he cometh!"

The shut door. "Too late" are awful words. Lost wealth may be recovered; wasted years never. You have but one period of youthful days; one manhood, one old age. Once you saw over the doorway of the great feast, "Whosoever will." "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." But then you refused to enter. You risked all and lost all.

The cry of the foolish virgins was first to those who obeyed the Christ: "Give us of your oil." The wise virgins were not stingy; but they could not give personal purity to another. Character is not transferable. Next they cry, "Lord, Lord, open unto us." The answer came, "I know you not." Loving is knowing him. They had lost their first love, or had never loved at all. They had lived an aimless, careless life, not openly sinful, but neglectful of the warnings and promises of the Son of God.

The second coming. The Bridegroom would have his bride without spot or wrinkle, blameless and holy, ready for the marriage supper in the heavenly kingdom. The Revelator saw this general assembly of the church risen from rags to radiance, from dust to divinity, from shadow to sunshine, from earth to heaven.

All mankind is invited to this royal feast. The Bridegroom calls; the Spirit and the Bride say come; angel voices echo the invitations in sweet ministries; every golden moment is an open door for our entrance—will you linger till too late?

* The International Sunday School Lessons for Sunday, September 13, 1914. The Ten Virgins. Matt. 25: 1-13. Golden Text: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." Matt. 25: 13.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By F. B. Meyer

"Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." Matt. 25: 13.

This does not mean that we are to spend our lives on the balcony or in the porch, looking up and down the road, and listening for the distant chariot-wheels. To do so would be to neglect the serious work of life, and expose ourselves to the reproof given in the next parable to the man that hid the talent. Our best way of preparing for the Lord's sudden return will surely be to go on doing faithfully the work he has entrusted. "Blessed is that servant whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." Wesley said that if he knew the Lord to be coming on the evening of the next day, he would make no alteration in his plans, but fulfil the preaching engagements on which he had already determined. But the watchful servant will leave nothing to chance, nothing half-done, nothing neglected and slurred over; because he may never be able to return to finish it. And, in whatever room he may be at work, he will always face the window which looks out on the way along which his Master went.

Disappointment

By Arthur H. Howland

ANOTHER marriage scene! This time not the marriage of a king's son, but of any young couple, son and daughter of well-to-do people in an Oriental town. The bride and her party are waiting the coming of the bridegroom, who is feasting with his friends. All is in readiness; the confusion of preparation is passed; and while the bridegroom is awaited the drowsy attendants doze.

Ward, in his History of the Hindus, describes an Oriental wedding, which makes the pictures of this parable of Jesus stand out in vivid detail. He writes:

"At a marriage, the procession of which I saw some years ago, the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water. After waiting for two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, 'Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.' All the persons employed now lighted their lamps and ran with them in their hands to fill up their stations in the procession. Some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved on to the house of the bride. . . . The bridegroom . . . sat a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately closed and guarded by the Sepoys. I and others desired to enter, and expostulated with the doorkeepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with our Lord's beautiful parable as at this moment. And the door was shut."

We cannot be sure just what kind of lamps these bridal attendants had. It may have been the small Oriental lamp, with pictures of which we are familiar, an artistic little cup with handle and wick. It was, more probably, a torch made of rags wound about a piece of iron and fastened to a wooden stick. Oil was poured on this wick from a separate vessel. The foolish attendants, not realizing how quickly their torches would burn out, took no additional oil. So when the procession came they had no lights. Lights were not only needed for the display, but also may have been required for getting through the streets, as some Oriental towns forbid pedestrians at night to proceed without carrying lights.

These thoughtless young women met continued disappointment. Their friends refused to share their oil. It was too late to find open shops in which to purchase more, or at least the nearest shop open was so far away that by the time they reached the house of festivities "the door was shut."

While thinking of the terrible spiritual tragedy implied in this story we must not overlook the simple humanness of the grief of these young girls. They had been so proud to be selected as attendants, so busy getting ready, so eager for the time to come when all the lights and music and feasting and merriment would be going on about them, and they having a proud and happy place near the center of it all. But instead of this came the bitter disappointment. No access to the merriment and honor. Nothing but the shut door.

Many of us can perhaps recall social disappointments like this, when we had counted on a good time, and were for some reason or other kept out of it. Such childish or youthful memories may remain in after life among the pictures of our most real griefs.

One word brings us to the heart of the lesson: Ready. "They that were ready went in." It is a tragic thing to be unready. These young women had spent time and thought and pains to get ready, but when the moment came they were not ready.

There are many applications. The parable has been referred to Christ's coming again. No one can tell when it will be. Many think that these hideous European battles, so unlike all that we have thought of as modern and possible, may fit into the Bible descriptions of the things that will be happening just before Christ comes back. He may come soon. No one knows. But all must be ready. Are you?

Or it may mean death—his coming to each of us, one by one, to take us into the other life. His coming may be delayed. Or he may come soon. Are we ready?

And every day this parable comes true in some life. The door of some opportunity for service opens. It may be a big task, or a little task that will soon lead to a big one. Christ comes to us with the great gift of a chance to do something for him. We may have hoped and planned for the time, and dreamed of its coming. But a thousand things tend to divert us; our sensibilities slumber; our spiritual sensitiveness or power may slip away. Suddenly comes the task, and we are not ready. "Watch therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour."

THE LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Superintendent

THE Sunday school training of all school officers and committee workers involves the following:

1. A book on the Sunday school organization.
2. A specialization book.
3. Method material (presented in these articles).
4. Practice work.
5. A thesis, or paper, showing a plan of work.

For the young man in the training class looking forward to the position of superintendent, or for the superintendent who desires to increase his efficiency, the following course is suggested:

I. Required for general study with the class. One of the following books on Sunday school organization:

The Efficient Sunday School. (Cope.)
The Graded Sunday School. (Meyer.)
The Organized Sunday School. (Axtell.)
Grading the Sunday School. (Axtell.)
Modern Sunday School in Principle and Practice. (Cope.)

II. Required for specialization. One of the following books on Sunday school methods, to be studied at home:

How to Conduct the Sunday School. (Lawrance.)
The Superintendent and His Work. (Brown.)
The Sunday School at Work. (Faris.)
Modern Methods in Sunday School Work. (Mead.)
Sparks From a Superintendent's Anvil. (Schauffler.)
Building the Sunday School. (Hurlbut.)

III. Method books for optional reading:

Thirty Years at a Superintendent's Desk. (Pepper.)
A Manual of Sunday School Methods. (Foster.)
Ways of Working. (Schauffler.)
How to Make the Sunday School Go. (Bremer.)
Sunday School Success. (Wells.)
Housing and Equipping the Sunday School. (Lawrence.)

IV. Method points for the superintendent:

1. Organization:

(a) Attempt only that measure of organization required by local needs and conditions. (b) This organization should aim to meet the needs of the scholar and community and should cover effective Bible study during the Sunday session and reach the week-day life of scholar and teacher. It should deal therefore with: Officers, teachers, pupils, curriculum and session, committees, homes and community.

2. Officers:

(a) These will vary according to the size of the school, running from the requirement of the small school, say: Superintendent, secretary and treasurer, organist and chorister, to the large school with assistant superintendents in charge of particular tasks, department superintendents, birthday and absentee secretaries and committees having in charge the promotion of many lines of school activities.

(b) The superintendent should nominate these officers who are to be so closely associated with him subject to confirmation by the proper board.

(c) He will see that the books named in these articles dealing in turn with these officers, are placed in the hands of these officers to train them to do efficient work and thus lighten his own burdens.

(d) He will make of these officers a cabinet for purpose of conference on school plans.

3. Teachers:

(a) The best method of securing teachers is to make them out of your young people from sixteen to twenty years of age. At sixteen place in their hands a teacher training book, instruct them week by week yourself if a competent teacher cannot be found. When they complete the course, honor their work by a public recognition of it in the church or Sunday school session.

(b) When a teacher is elected send him or her a welcome letter with suggestions for service.

(c) Send a birthday letter to each teacher as a superintendent, and pray for officers and teachers daily, and especially on their birthdays.

(d) Bring the teachers together monthly for prayer and discussion of the school's spiritual needs.

(e) Hold a monthly business rally of the teachers to present plans of lesson preparation and teaching, and to discuss school plans. See plans for this in The Superintendent and His Work. (Brown.)

(f) Plan for a social gathering of your teachers through a monthly supper and an annual gathering.

(g) Send to teachers helpful leaflets and clippings from Sunday school papers bearing on their work and keep a few good books in circulation to broaden their vision and to help them to do better class work. Such books as The Worker and His Work series of the Board of Sunday schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church. (1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.)

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

DURING the first days of the war in Europe our minds were so shocked and stunned that it seemed impossible to believe the dreadful facts. News of the first battles filled us with genuine and sympathetic grief. There is danger that as the war news continues to come we shall grow hardened to it. We shall forget the cries of the little fatherless children, the aged mothers, the young wives. We shall cease to shudder at the thought of the cries of the wounded, the ghastly spectacle of the dead. We must not allow ourselves to grow used to these things. That is one of the deadliest curses of war; that it tends to deaden the sensibilities of the whole human race. We must keep thinking of Christ and his unspeakable grief and disappointment at what is happening. So must we continue to pray vehemently that the days of war shall be brief. God has not forgotten Europe. He has a plan for her. Let us pray that in all this tangle and horror of human strife he will overrule events and compel people and nations to work out his will.

Prayers have been requested for a number of people afflicted or threatened with blindness. Mrs. B. O., of Indianapolis, Ind., thanks God for restoration of sight, and J. H. F. P., of Magness, Ark., acknowledges God's goodness in healing her little daughter's eyes. P. N. L., of Oberlin, Ohio, calls upon us to rejoice with her that her eyesight is better. All these friends also express thanks for answers to other prayers: Mrs. O., that a young lady for whom she asked prayers has returned to the Lord; P. N. L., that a church in Oberlin is being blessed, also a family, also a man for whom prayer had been asked.

Mrs. A. M. W., of New London, Conn., writes that two prayers have been answered: her sister has been converted and joined the church, and a cousin has accepted Christ as his Saviour. Mrs. M. M. B. rejoices that her daughter has found spiritual light, and Mrs. J. M. R., of Edwards, Miss., that her daughter, who was seriously ill, has been healed.

A sad letter comes from a mother who lost a son two years ago and still grieves for him. She is in very poor health, is passing through other great trials, and asks the prayers of the League. Mrs. M. L. T. asks prayer for recovery from a severe nervous trouble, and expresses an earnest desire for the consciousness of greater nearness to God and strengthened faith. Miss P. A. M. wishes to work as a teacher, for which she is already equipped, but is hindered by being a cripple, forced to walk with two crutches. She asks prayers. H. A. B. asks prayers for special healing and for liberation from distressing circumstances. Mrs. E. L. McL. asks special prayer for relief from trials and needs.

L. V. M. asks prayer for victory of State-wide prohibition in Virginia; Mrs. T. R., for nation-wide prohibition; J. Z., for a revival at Spandau, Germany; E. A. H., for prohibition victory in California in November, and for the useful success of the W. C. T. U. of Seeley, Calif.; P. N. L., that a minister may be blessed by the Holy Spirit; Mrs. S. I., for a world-wide revival.

Mrs. S. A. S. requests prayer for a revival at Emporia, Kan.; Rev. J. N. for God's blessing upon camp-meeting at Providence, R. I., and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon every member of his church; M. J. R., for a great revival at Elsberry, Mo.; K. Q., for a great revival in the church at Southampton, L. I., and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the people; Mrs. P. H., for a revival at Churchill, Ontario; G. M. C., for a spiritual awakening in the community of Stacey, Calif.; Mrs. J. T. D., that Holy Spirit may revive every member of a church at Daytona, Fla., also for blessing upon a class of nine girls; Miss I. P. J., for presence of God's Spirit during revival meeting at Cambria, Mo.; A Reader, that a church may be built at Sharp Corner, Ontario; Mrs. L. M. N., that a pastor be sent to the Congregational Church at Sanbornton, N. H.

The following friends request prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

Mrs. P. T. F.; Mrs. T. G. E.; Mrs. W. S. P.; Mrs. S. W. C.; Mrs. T. M.; Mrs. S. I.; Mrs. S. P. B.; V. S.; Mrs. C. C. M.; Miss I. E. W.; Mrs. A. R.; A. G. L.; M. L. S.; Miss F. I. S.; M. F.; Mrs. W. McC.; J. R. K.; Mrs. W. A.; Mrs. M. H. W.; Mrs. E. H. (to be cleansed from all sin); M.; A Reader, Jonesboro, Tenn.; Mrs. S. C. M.; Miss M. H.

Miss S., Mrs. J. S. G., and Mrs. A. S. ask prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. A. M. C., that son's sight may be restored; B. O., that eyesight may be fully restored. S. E. H. requests prayer that son's mind may be restored; J. Z., that brother's mind may be restored; Miss S. C., that sister's mind may be restored; Mrs. S. I., E. C. M., Miss E. F. E., that minds of other friends be strengthened or restored; A Reader, Louisville, Ky., that son's mind may be fully restored.

L. V. M. asks prayer that three brothers be saved from the drink habit; Mrs. A. M. C., two brothers; Mrs. A. J. H., three brothers; Mrs. D. H. W., two sons; Mrs. F. E. H., Mrs. L. S., Mrs. M. T. D., sons; "A Poor Woman" and Mrs. G. H., husbands; Miss S., that brother may be saved from drink and be brought back to wife and family.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Mrs. S. E. G.; Mrs. E. M.; Mrs. S. C. M.; Mrs. M. E. B.; Mrs. F. E. H.; E. C. M.; Mrs. M. S.; Mrs. W. A.; Mrs. L. W.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of husbands:

Mrs. S. W. C.; E. C. H.; Mrs. C. V. T.; Mrs. J. G. K.; N. S.; Mrs. W. McC.; J. R. K.; Mrs. W. A.; Mrs. P.; Mrs. J. F. C.; "A Poor Woman."

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends:

Mrs. F. R.; Mrs. S. W. C.; Mrs. S. I.; Mrs. A. McM.; I. L. M.; Mrs. E. B.; E. B.; Mrs. E. M.; Mrs. A. C.; V. S.; Mrs. W. S. McA.; E. C. H.; Mrs. A. R.; J. Z.; Mrs. S. E. D.; Mrs. L. C.; A. G. L.; L. D.; M. F.; Mrs. W.; H. R.; G. J. S.; E. S. M.; Mrs. L. W.

The following friends ask prayer for healing for themselves or others:

Mrs. T. G. E.; Mrs. B. O.; Mrs. I. E. W.; Mrs. J. S. G.; Miss M. S.; Mrs. F. N. P.; Mrs. M. Van S.; Mrs. P. T. F.; Mrs. T. G. E.; Mrs. S. W. C.; Mrs. H. M. M.; Mrs. L. P. G.; Miss M. H.; Miss L. R.; L. V. M.; E. F.; G. C. G.; Mrs. S. P. B.; Mrs. H. E. S.; Mrs. A. McM.; Mrs. C. A. L.; I. L. M.; A. N. C.; E. B.; A Girl, Roberts, Idaho; V. S.; W. E. B.; Mr. and Mrs. L. C.; J. D.; B.; Mr. and Mrs. J. W. H.; A. C. W.; Mrs. I. B.; M. R. C.; Mrs. C. M.; A. L. W.; H. A. B.; Mrs. D. W.; K. S. C.; R. B.; M. L. S.; Mrs. F. A. C.; M. L. H.; J. V. S.; Mrs. M. S.; Mrs. H. L. S.; Miss F. I. S.; Mrs. D. H. W.; Mrs. F. D. M.; Mrs. M. J. B.; Mrs. H. L. S. (to regain use of limbs); Mrs. W. McC.; J. R. K.; Mrs. C. E. E.; Mrs. W. A.; Mrs. M. H. W.; Mrs. M. T. D.; Reader, Oakville, Pa. (that child may regain use of limbs); Nom-de-plume, Louisville, Ky.; M.; Mrs. P.; Mrs. B. E.; A Reader, Urbana, Ill.

UNJUST LEGISLATION

POLITICAL economists have uniformly held that free and fair competition is the surest basis of national prosperity; and Congress, in recognition of this principle, has for more than twenty years been trying to find some way in which to ensure a continuance of the competitive system by curbing the growing power of the trusts; yet recently bills have been simultaneously introduced in the Senate by Mr. Jones, of Washington, and in the House of Representatives by Mr. Carter, of Oklahoma, and by Mr. Byrnes of South Carolina, whose effect will be to limit competition in the one business in which the national welfare demands the fullest and freest competition—namely, the life insurance business.

These bills are much alike in phraseology, and almost identical in terms. In effect they seek to make it unlawful for any person or persons to procure any contract of insurance on either persons or property by mail, save in States in which the insuring company is licensed.

It will be noted that the bills apply to both life and fire insurance, but in effect they are aimed at one life insurance company—the Postal Life Insurance Company—which does business by mail, employing no agents, but offering to give its policy-holders the benefit of the usual agent's commission.

The Postal Life Insurance Company is licensed in New York, and does business under the supervision of the New York State Insurance Department; and it will occur to any fair-minded man that the Postal Life must be exercising a constitutional right in declining to submit to the exactions of the various States other than New York, or those States would long ago have obliged the company to cease doing business therein. The animus of these bills is, therefore, abundantly clear: it is an attempt to use Congress as a club to enable the States to enforce their exactions against the Postal Life.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD holds no brief for the Postal Life, nor for any individual insurance company, but we point out that the effect of the proposed legislation would be to limit competition in the life insurance business by sandbagging the one company that stoutly represents the non-agency idea, and therefore furnishes real competition in a business in which competition is necessary to the public weal. Competition between agency companies is merely commercial, but competition between the Postal Life and the agency companies involves the question whether the payment of excessive commissions is either necessary or equitable, and is therefore illuminating and refining. It is the sort of competition that keeps premium rates down to a proper figure.

Again, we must not lose sight of the fact that the Jones-Carter-Byrnes Act (should it become law) might readily be invoked by the larger companies to kill off their smaller competitors, whose business is largely local. Many small companies are licensed only in their home State; but inevitably, by the removal of policyholders to other States, they come to have policyholders scattered, here and there, in various parts of the country. The Jones-Carter-Byrnes bills would prevent the collection of premiums from these removed policyholders by mail, or even the mailing of notices of premiums falling due; and as the little local company would not be justified in securing a State license for the purpose of enabling it lawfully to collect a few scattered premiums, the small fry would be left to the mercy of the big fish, company growth would be restricted, and competition strangled.

On the whole, it may be said that no more vicious legislation was ever introduced into Congress than this unjust and uneconomic bill. It should, and doubtless will, be defeated.

Convince Yourself

ITS very appearance tells a story of purity. It is creamy white and just stiff enough to round up nicely on the spoon.

Then see if it has an odor. You will find none but a delicate aroma, indicative of its purity. Crisco remains sweet in hot weather without refrigeration.

Next taste it. You will find a neutral taste; that is, practically no flavor—not greasy or "lardy." It resembles cold, unsalted butter.

Then try it. First fry potatoes, and note the wholesome potato flavor. You may never have known the potato flavor before because the taste of the fat you have been using has predominated. Crisco allows the true flavor of the food to assert itself.

Next make some biscuits. See how light they are. Break one open and you will be delighted with its appetizing odor. This is a severe test for a shortening.

Please convince yourself about Crisco. If you will know Crisco you will be a Crisco enthusiast. This attractive book will help you to know Crisco.

Beautiful cloth-bound book of new recipes and a "Calendar of Dinners" for five 2-cent stamps!

This handsome book by Marion Harris Neil, Cookery Editor, Ladies' Home Journal, gives 615 excellent tested recipes. Also contains a "Calendar of Dinners"—a dinner menu for every day in the year. The Calendar tells what; the recipes tell how. Book also contains cookery hints and the interesting story of Crisco's development. Bound in rich blue and gold cloth. DEATH OF PIUS X to determine what men shall believe; he has demanded the concurrent assent of every believer for every action of the Roman Catholic Church, by which a certain teaching or movement is pronounced heretical; he has "reprobated and proscribed" the thought that non-Catholic interpreters have reproduced the true meaning of Holy Writ more faithfully than Catholic interpreters; he has denounced the idea that the divine revelation, which constitutes the object of Catholic, or Christian, faith, was not complete in the days of the apostles, although dogmas have been published in his own days by his church, which were unknown in the days of the apostles and of the early Christian Church. (See Syllabus Nos. 4, 6, 7, 19, etc.) If consistency were always a virtue, and commendable, he should now deserve the encomium of posterity, which no doubt he will receive from those whose cause he has represented. The unbiased historian, however, will write Pius X as a Pope of Popes, a true son of that spirit which has troubled the church and the world for many centuries.

It is a spectacle that saddens the reflecting beholder—this monotonous procession of the Roman Pontiffs. No matter what their previous history or their personal inclinations or aspirations may have been, when the tiara adorns their head and the fisherring glistens on their finger, they become stereotype beings. Names may change—what is in a name? Forms and features may be altered—what value is there in them? Roma semper eadem: Rome changeth never. Pontifex semper idem: Popes are only reprints of former editions, unaltered and unrevised. And so, Popes may come, and Popes may go,

But the Jesuits go on forever.

D.

JESUIT HEAD ALSO DIES

A DESPATCH from Rome (August 20) announcing the death of Pope Pius X, significantly adds these words: "Father Francis Xavier Wernz, general of the Society of Jesus, also died in Rome this morning. Father Wernz was called the Black Pope, a nickname used to indicate his power behind the throne."

This priest had been considered as among the possible successors to Pope Pius X. He was elected general of the Jesuit Order in September, 1906, having entered the order at the age of fifteen. Born in Rottweil, Württemberg, in 1842, he left Germany when the Jesuits were driven out, but lived to see the members of that order readmitted. An early election of a successor is considered doubtful owing to the difficulties of travel raised by the war.

The selection of a German to head the Jesuits excited no little stir in the Catholic world at the time. The founder of the order was the Spaniard St. Ignatius Loyola, but from the beginning the majority of the generals have been Italians. The nickname of "Black Pope" has reference, as stated in the quoted despatch above, to the power of the Jesuits behind the Papacy, and also to the garb of that order as distinguished from others. The coincidence of the almost simultaneous deaths of these two personages has been widely commented on by the press.

IN TIMES OF WAR

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IF, ONLY a few days ago, some far-seeing person had told me that all Europe was on the brink of the most terrible war in history, I would have gasped unbelievingly. So would any of our country people. And yet we read in the papers that old historic countries are being laid waste and that thousands are being killed every day. And being divided from the fighting by the large and very salty ocean that rolls between Europe and America, we find it hard to realize that the blood-red headlines are true.

Patriotism and conquest are hard words—for man will lay down his life to satisfy the demands of the simple letters. Love and honor are strong, also; strong enough to tear a family apart and mow them down with shot and shell. And so, the papers tell us, are thousands dying.

I read yesterday of a struggle on the border line between two countries. The words were few, for the fight had been a small and unimportant one. "The losses were trifling," ran the notice, "with only some thirty men and two officers killed."

Thirty-two men! And yet every one of the thirty-two had a mother, perhaps a sister, a sweetheart, or a wife. In a number of tiny cottages the news of the "trifling loss" brought terrible grief. For the loss of one man is more terrible to a broken mother-heart than the loss of a thousand—no, ten thousand—men is to an empire.

A couple of years ago, shortly before the Titanic disaster, I was talking to a schoolgirl friend. When we spoke of the deaths that had taken place her merry little face grew serious, and her lips drew down into a sharp, thin line.

"It is too terrible to imagine," she said.

"But think of the brave men who died," I reminded sadly. "Think of the boys, and the fathers, and the husbands that stood back so that the women could be saved!"

The girl's face grew hard—the thin line of her lips grew tighter.

"It's all right to talk," she said fiercely, "when we haven't been there. It's all very well to say that they were brave—brave! If I had been on that boat with my son or my husband I would have made them come off—"

"And would you have loved a coward?" I asked.

"I would have loved a live coward," she answered quickly; "I would have loved him better than a dead hero!"

So spoke the schoolgirl.

A few days ago I talked with a friend just back from Europe. He had visited men who are now in the midst of war.

"It's merciless!" I sighed to him.

"It is," he agreed sadly, "and it's war to the death, too! Think of the personal loss to the ones at home."

"I should think," I exclaimed, voicing half unconsciously the schoolgirl's view; "I should think that the mothers would rather have the boys at home—would make them stay at home!"

My friend laughed—a bit uncertainly. "Keep them home! Why, it's an honor to have them die that way. They're happy—the mothers—even though they grieve."

Happy! Glad to have them die that way! An honor to have your son shot to pieces! I wonder how many of us feel that way about the words "patriotism," and "love," and "honor"!

When I went to school we had in the English course what we called "Long Themes." Twice a year we had them, and if they were good they helped to pass us in our examinations. At the time they seemed very important to me, for the words grew up into thousands (which seems commonplace enough nowadays), and the pages of copypaper became piles. I remember, very distinctly, the pride with which I handed in my first long theme, and the blushes with which I heard it read. It was called "A Historical Novel," and the scene was laid in Greek history at the battle of Thermopylæ. It was full of love scenes that would have done credit to a dime novel, and war scenes that would have satisfied a messenger boy's thirst for dramatic literature. It was concerned with the heart affairs of a faithless but beautiful Greek maiden named Ariadne and a brave soldier—whose name I do not recall—who died, breathing prayers to Zeus and defiance to his enemies, in the last paragraph. The most stirring passage of all was borrowed, with fine disregard to dates, from a cavalier poet, for my hero quoted, as he showered kisses on the hand of the beautiful lady who was begging him to stay home from war:

> I would not love thee, dear, so much,
> Loved I not honor more!

I laugh as I think of the story, and the look in my beloved teacher's eyes as she read it. But the laugh dies away as I think that all over Europe soldiers are saying that same thing in different tongues to weeping women, who may be young and fair, or old and bent and gray.

A few days ago I received a letter from a sweet little lady, and though it was just a friendly, commonplace little note I am going to quote some of it.

"As I write," she told me, "I can see a golden head bobbing among the daisies in the field next door—my little boy. He is playing with the flowers, and I in my open window am writing to you, although my thoughts follow the rippling line that he makes as he runs through the tall grass. I can hear his little laugh and his voice calling to me softly. Oh, how I thank God for my boy!"

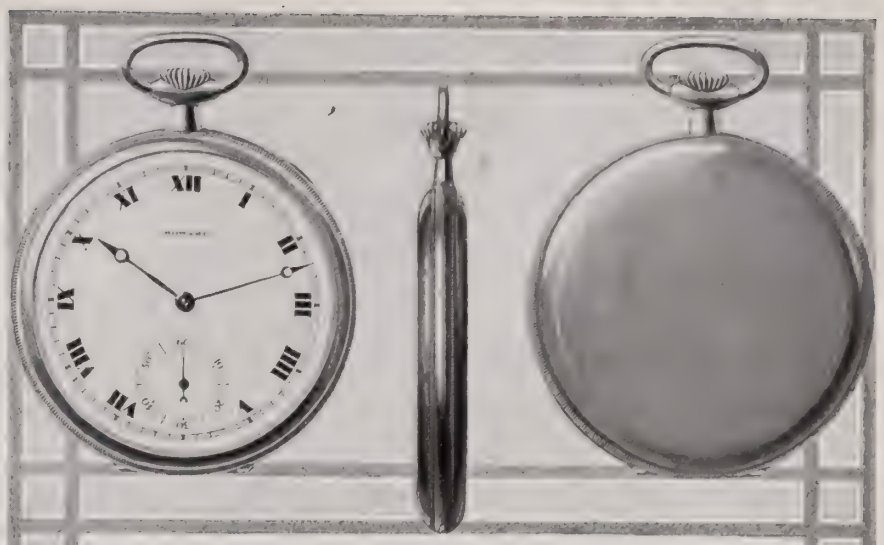
Far away over the seas other boys are tramping away, but the sound borne back on the summer breeze is the sound of a battle-cry instead of a laugh. And the ripples behind them are not the ripples that their swift walk makes in the daisies and the tall grasses—for the path is blood-marked and strewn with other boys, dead and dying. Back in her cottage with open windows another mother—a million mothers—are sitting, thinking of the little golden-haired children who played with the flowers and sang at their play.

Oh, American wives and mothers, just now our land is practically the only big country that is bathed with the sunshine of love! Thank God, thank him with all of your hearts, for his mercy, and pray for those wives and mothers over the sea who are waiting dry-eyed, proud, for news.

A PRAYER

GOD of the hosts that fight and die,
Mid smoke and din, and shot and shell,
Through all the noises of a hell—
The curse, the groan, the battle-cry,
Our prayers go toward the far blue sky,
O Lord, to ask that we may be
From pain, and care, and sorrow free,
Until at last we come to dwell
Near thee, on high.

God of the multitudes that groan,
And yet strive on where cannon rolls,
Where death hews down its bloody tolls,
Whose weary hearts begin to moan
Amid the battle's sullen drone.
O Father, hear our humble prayer!
Protect this country bright and fair!
We lean our swords, we lean our souls,
On thee alone. Amen.



The New Howard
Ionic

The latest achievement of the HOWARD Watchmakers and one of the most beautiful Time-pieces ever designed.

The HOWARD Ionic—12-size, 17-jewel, extra-thin, open-face, the movement adjusted to three positions, temperature and isochronism, cased in a single-joint gold-filled case of special design, exceedingly flat and compact—price $40.

Owing to the extreme care given to the finish and adjustment of every HOWARD movement, only a small number of these new watches will be available this year.

The more enterprising jewelers will make a point of having a few to show, and we would strongly advise anyone who is interested to see the Ionic and make reservation at an early date.

A Howard Watch is always worth what you pay for it. The price of each Watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel double roller in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH. The jeweler who can is a good man to know.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

What Is a Good Education?*

STARTLING changes are taking place in the answers to this question: "What is a good education?" In many respects we are turning absolutely right about face.

A good education helps us to understand life. Much so-called education has been as silly as the efforts of the "pillar saints" to obtain piety by living on top of a pillar, far above people. They could not find out about life up there. The mind needs periods of isolation, and the soul needs times of communion with God, but life is found down where men and women live. It is hard to see what bearing higher mathematics and much burrowing among dead languages and literature can have upon life. That is our problem—to live—and an education must help us find its answer.

This does not mean that an education should merely teach us how to "make a living." That is quite different from making a life. Some people have objected to the newer ideas of education as "utilitarian"; that is, concerned only with what can be used for practical and more or less immediate results. But much of the old-fashioned ideas of education had the same fault. They fitted a man to be successful, which meant to outstrip others; to get gains from them. The new idea is service. We must understand people not to find out what we can get out of them, but what we can put into their lives.

A good education will teach us how to work. Much education has been taken as showing us a way to avoid work. The biggest thing about school life has been vacation time. The pupils have gotten the conviction that if they trained their brains sufficiently they would not have to use their hands. They have been made to feel in some subtle way that labor is a disgrace, and that laboring people are to be despised by "successful" people. The newer education recognizes work as the basis of life. It seeks to equalize the burdens of the world's work and is also interested in equalizing the gains of the world's work. It trains workers, not shirkers.

The newer education seeks not to lift up a few to the places of leisure and culture and enjoyment, but seeks to find a way to bringing the refinements and quietnesses of life to all. Time to think, time to play, time to study not what we must but what we like, time to look at beautiful things, time to cheer our friends—these are matters which must be shared by all, not enjoyed by the few while others bear unbearable burdens of haste and strain and care.

The newer education will recognize God. A way must be found for his having a place in the study life of young people. Fear of him is the beginning of wisdom, and an education which turns out young men and women with no fear of God is producing fools, not people truly wise.

Study history; study economics; study industries; study government; study literature, rather than languages; study people people everywhere you find them; study missions at home and abroad; learn to do accurately, vigorously and fruitfully certain definite kinds of work; learn to enjoy the arts and if possible to do something at one of them; learn to be a friend of Christ; learn how to help him in his plan of saving the world.

Paul, His Lifework and Mine†

I HAVE lately been reading Guy Thorne's book about Frederick N. Carrington, The Great Acceptance. In some respects Carrington's experience was like Paul's. He thought he was all right, found he was all wrong, made the great surrender and the great acceptance, then lived a life of glorious achievement.

The secret of his spiritual victories, and Paul's, and every one's who has them, lies in those words Paul spoke while lying in the dust of the Damascus road: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" We must acknowledge and act upon the truth of what Jesus said: "Without me ye can do nothing," before we can share in Paul's triumphant boast: "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me."

In picking out your career, consider the things you like to do, the things you can do best. God gave you these aptitudes, and they are to be followed, not fought; though you may have to serve a long apprenticeship in doing things you don't like before you can swing out fully into doing the things you do.

Do what you can do best.

Go where you are most needed.

Start in anywhere; only get busy and keep busy.

But don't be impatient. God often takes a long time to get his servants ready.

One word more, perhaps two. Don't think that to give your life to religious work you must become a minister or a missionary. If God calls you to these tasks go gladly. But remember there never were such opportunities as now for Christian work that is unprofessional. The man who works with other men and like other men, yet gives the bulk of his thought and interest and all the time and strength possible to works of evangelism and reform, is a man who has an exceptional leverage in his appeal.

Lastly, in training and planning for your work, see that you are getting down among people, not up away from them in your interests and understandings. Read the Christian Endeavor notes for to-day on education. Remember that it is down where people live and work and suffer that you will find Jesus.

The American City‡

NEW YORK, with its Jews, Italians, and Slavs; Chicago, with its Huns and Poles; San Francisco, with its Chinatown—what duties and opportunities the American cities present for the Christian worker with the missionary spirit! It has been pointed out that we can preach the Gospel to all the world by preaching it to foreigners in America, for many of them return to their own lands to tell the story of salvation they have learned here.

Vacation Bible schools, outdoor evangelism, playgrounds for children, social welfare centers, shop meetings, labor bureaus, the Gospel and a helping hand to the immigrants as they land, organization of Sunday schools and churches for immigrants, these are some of the countless ways the people of American churches can help the foreign population of our cities.

Then, too, the church people should clean up the cities themselves, their governments, their amusements; should labor to rid them of vice and the saloon; should be leaders in everything that helps and liberates and uplifts the people.

The Gospel of Christ is equal to the emergencies of the American city. Let us apply it.

SOUTHERN CHINA'S GREAT FLOOD

ON June 29 last, a missionary Relief Committee met at the United States consulate in Canton, China, and together with the consul general, Hon. F. D. Cheshire, cabled to the State Department at Washington appealing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the Red Cross Society for help to relieve the widespread and acute distress caused by floods in Southern China.

Mr. H. O. T. Burkwell, secretary of the committee, writes describing the situation. He says: "In June the water in the West River stood rather low for the season. Heavy rains then caused it to rise very suddenly. In a few hours during one day it rose thirty-eight feet, and shortly afterwards rose another twenty-two feet. The waters stopped rising only at seventy-two feet five inches! This was at Wuchow, where the large Fu River joins the West River. Usually the people are prepared for a slow annual rise, up to sixty or sixty-five feet. This sudden rise was unprecedented, and the people were taken by surprise. Chinese historians state that there have been only three such floods in over three hundred years.

"Such a sudden rise could only mean devastation all down the course of the river. Banks and strongly built dykes gave way. The gorge flooded immense areas inland. Below the gorge, the water rose over two feet above the highest banks, carrying everything in its wake. An area of one hundred miles each way was thus covered with water. Villages, towns and cities were submerged to the eaves of the houses. Thus the water stood for more than a week.

"The rice was nearing harvest time. The flood made harvesting impossible. Whole villages and markets have been wiped out of existence as far as houses and shops are concerned. The loss of life was great because the flood struck the lower part of the river after nightfall. Thousands upon thousands were driven in flight to the hills and mountains, without food or clothing. Hunger and exposure told rapidly on these refugees. A relief committee of representative missionaries has been formed to work with a strong committee of Chinese Christians. The Relief Committee includes: Rev. R. E. Chambers (Baptist), Rev. C. A. Nelson (American Board), Rev. G. D. Thomson (American Presbyterian); Rev. E. Dewstoe (English Wesleyan); Rev. R. Zimmerling (Berlin Missionary), G. E. Lerrigo, Y. M. C. A. treasurer."

In response to the appeal made by the State Department through the CHRISTIAN HERALD in our issue of July 15, readers have sent in $765.55, and this amount has been sent to Washington to be forwarded to the committee.

SISTER'S TRICK

But It All Came Out Right

How a sister played a trick that brought rosy health to a coffee fiend is an interesting tale:

"I was a coffee fiend—a trembling, nervous, physical wreck, yet clinging to the poison that stole away my strength. I mocked at Postum and would have none of it.

"One day my sister substituted a cup of piping hot Postum for my morning cup of coffee but did not tell me what it was. I noticed the richness of it and remarked that the 'coffee' tasted fine but my sister did not tell me I was drinking Postum for fear I might not take any more.

"She kept the secret and kept giving me Postum instead of coffee until I grew stronger, more tireless, got a better color in my sallow cheeks and a clearness to my eyes, then she told me of the health-giving, nerve-strengthening life-saver she had given me in place of my morning coffee.

"From that time I became a disciple of Postum and no words can do justice in telling the good this cereal drink did me. I will not try to tell it, for only after having used it can one be convinced of its merits."

Ten days' trial shows Postum's power to rebuild what coffee has destroyed.

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Questions and Answers

Theophilus, Alta. What prophet, apostle, or preacher ever had a salary for delivering God's message to men? Is the custom of stated salaries such as can be defended on the basis of New Testament teaching?

Under the Levitical law, due provision was made for the maintenance of the priests and teachers in the Jewish church, but nothing of this kind was known in the primitive Christian church. It is distinctly implied, however, in various passages of the New Testament that the church had a duty to maintain its religious teachers. (See Matt. 10: 10, I Cor. 9: 14, etc.) In the apostolic age this maintenance consisted in supplying their immediate personal wants. (II Cor. 11: 7, 8 and Phil. 4: 16-18). In those early days the church owned little or no property, but later, specific provision was made for the support of the clergy. This included fees for particular services, first-fruits, voluntary offerings which probably supplemented any meager allowance from the church's treasury. 2. There is no specific rule laid down in the New Testament on the subject. The ancient Jewish law is regarded by some as a precedent. It is very clear that, even in apostolic times, it was a recognized principle that the laborer was "worthy of his hire." In our own day, a congregation would be considered very unappreciative of God's message to men if it did not support its own minister.

W. M. B., Charlotte, N. C. If trusting in God wholly and entirely for protection was the right way for Ezra and his company, with their little ones and all their substance, why is it not still the right way for us, with our little ones, and all our substance?

Ezra's faith in the divine protection was so strong that, although he must have been fully aware of the dangers attending the passage through the desert, he felt that God would give him and his company all the safeguard they required. He had already spoken so much to the king of the sufficiency of the divine care that he felt he could not ask for a military escort, as such a request would imply a lack of faith. "By a solemn act of fasting and prayer they committed themselves to the Keeper of Israel," and their great faith was rewarded. If the same indomitable trust in God were found in the hearts of men to-day, they would have the same results. God honors faith always, and he is as able to keep us from danger to-day as when he led his people through the Red Sea. Thousands of Christians can testify to the care and love of the heavenly Father in times of extremity and peril, when they have put their entire trust in him.

Q. J. B., Parkers Glen, Pa. It is stated by some writers that even as late as the time of Jerome (fourth century A.D.) the site of the camp at Gilgal and the twelve memorial stones set up by the Israelites were still distinguishable, but others have questioned this. Still, even later writers, including Thietmar (1217 A.D.) mentions the stones, and another, named Willibald, records that he saw them. Schwartz in his Physical Description of Palestine, p. 128, states that there is a heap of stones on a hill near the Jordan, which the Arabs call Galgala. All these are more or less doubtful, especially as the writers differ in the matter of location. No recent writer, as far as we know, makes any statement which would indicate that the ancient memorial of the first Israelitish camp is now visible.

P. T. W., Motley, Minn. The passage in Gen. 3: 22 is rendered somewhat difficult by an obscure translation, the better reading, according to Jamieson, Fausset and Brown, being "behold what has become of the man who was as one of us!" how he, who was formed in the divine image, has fallen from his righteous estate. Then, lest a worse evil should befall, and lest "he put forth his hand and take of the tree of life and live forever," the expulsion from Eden followed. Originally there was no prohibition except as to the one forbidden tree. All the trees of the garden were at their disposal, except the tree of knowledge. (See Gen. 2: 16, 17.) The tree of life, as commentators hold, was for the constant renewal of youth and vitality, a privilege now cut off through disobedience. The tree of life is first mentioned in Gen. 2: 9.

M. F., Decatur, Iowa. You ask "how one is to know that he is living close to God," and in your own letter you have come very near to touching the marrow of the matter. If we ask, in the name of his dear Son, for a daily infusion of strength and grace sufficient for our needs, he will grant our petition. Perhaps nowhere is the Christian life better expressed than in these lines from Professor David Smith. He is speaking of Christian duty: "The man who bravely goes his hard way by and by discovers God by his side. But there is a richer discovery—the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord; and it is revealed through love of one's fellow creatures. Keep your heart sweet and gentle; refrain from contention; look with kindly and sympathetic eyes on your fellow creatures, men and beasts and birds; consider their griefs and sufferings, and lend them your best comfort and succor. It is only as we love like Him that we know the wonder and glory of his love. There lies the twofold secret of reconciliation, of the linking of our little lives with the eternal order. Obey, and you will know; love, and the love of Christ will be shed abroad in your heart. And once the love of Christ takes possession of you, life will be more precious and wonderful in your eyes, and you will understand what St. Peter means by 'joy unspeakable and full of glory'—that deep, strong gladness which comes of the persuasion that the ultimate fact in the universe is the Love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord, the love which died on the cross for pity of the world's woe."

J. L. C., Savoy, Texas. The various passages in Ezekiel's vision, in which "wheels" and "rings" are mentioned, have been interpreted to indicate "the gigantic and tremendous energy of the complicated revolution of God's providence, bringing about his purposes with unerring certainty." They also express the manifold changes and revolutions in the world. Some interpreters of Ezekiel's vision suggest that the wheels—each intersecting another at right angles, so that the whole could move in any direction—illustrated God's purposes, which, however involved they may appear, cohere, being capable of motion in any direction without change of front. The simple modern illustration of the idea is the gyroscope, which is a wheel within a wheel.

Mrs. A. L. S., Fayette, Ohio. In Eph. 4: 8 the passage "He led captivity captive and gave gifts unto men," is interpreted to mean that the powers of captivity—Satan, death, and sin—had, by the death of the Saviour, been led as in triumphal procession to their destruction—the figure being taken from the triumphs of victorious generals in a great war. Further, it was the custom while a conqueror was enjoying his public triumph to distribute the spoils of his foes among his people; so Christ, following the same figure, imparts to his believing followers the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

E. J. L. L., Herrin, Ill. 1. The first question is controversial and cannot be answered by any quotation of Scripture. 2. There is no Bible which teaches Christianity other than the one Christian Bible. The other so-called Bibles are the Koran (Mohammedan), the Vedas (Hindu), the Zendavesta (Persian), the Eddas (Scandinavian), the Tri-Pitaka (Buddhist), and the Five Kings (Chinese). 3. All the great Christian denominations are working side by side in the missionary field, each doing its best, and the smaller denominations are also doing splendid work.

A. H. C., New Paris, Ohio. Owing to the revolution of our earth, the stars in the northern constellations appear to us to revolve around the polar star. This revolution is apparent only. Something analogous to this may be observed in riding on a rapidly moving car past a wooded field, the trees on which will appear to be moving around. It is an optical illusion. It is doubtless true that the stars do move, but their movement can be determined only by mathematical calculations.

S. P. LELAND.

J. R. G., Blooming Glen, Pa. 1. The phrase "every generation grows weaker and wiser" is not in the Bible. 2. The passage in Matt. 21: 43 is interpreted to mean that the visible kingdom (the church upon earth), which till then had stood in the seed of Abraham, would be taken from the Jews and that "the great evangelical community of the faithful," which would thereafter consist chiefly of the Gentiles, would thus be separated from the Jews until the time mentioned in Rom. 11: 25, 26.

M. J. S., Ripley, Ohio. 1. Deut. 23: 2, according to the commentators, refers to one born a stranger, a foreigner, a heathen, or the issue of a heathen and a Hebrew (see Isa. 23: 17, 18). It is not interpreted as meaning one born before the parents were united in lawful wedlock. 2. To "enter into the congregation of the Lord" means incorporation with the Jewish nation and eligibility to honors and offices in the church and the state.

N. S. N., Roosevelt, Utah. To answer all the assertions or discuss all the theories relating to evolution would take more space than we have at disposal.

Reader, Phœnixville, Pa. Contests of skill are not necessarily gambling, as far as the contestants are concerned. Wagers by outsiders on the result are gambling, however.

M. L., Chandler, Okla. No statistics on the subject.

METZ

The Quality Car

THE new fore-door model of the Metz Roadster appeals to your appreciation of Quality. Everything about it is expressive of efficiency. It won the last Glidden Tour, and scored sensational victories in the officially conducted hill-climbing contests last June and July at Uniontown and Richfield Springs, winning in open competition against cars of all makes and prices, including 60 and 90 horsepower racing models. It is handsome in appearance, its equipment is the best throughout, and in reliable road performance it has no superior. It is the recognized high-class car in the low-price class.

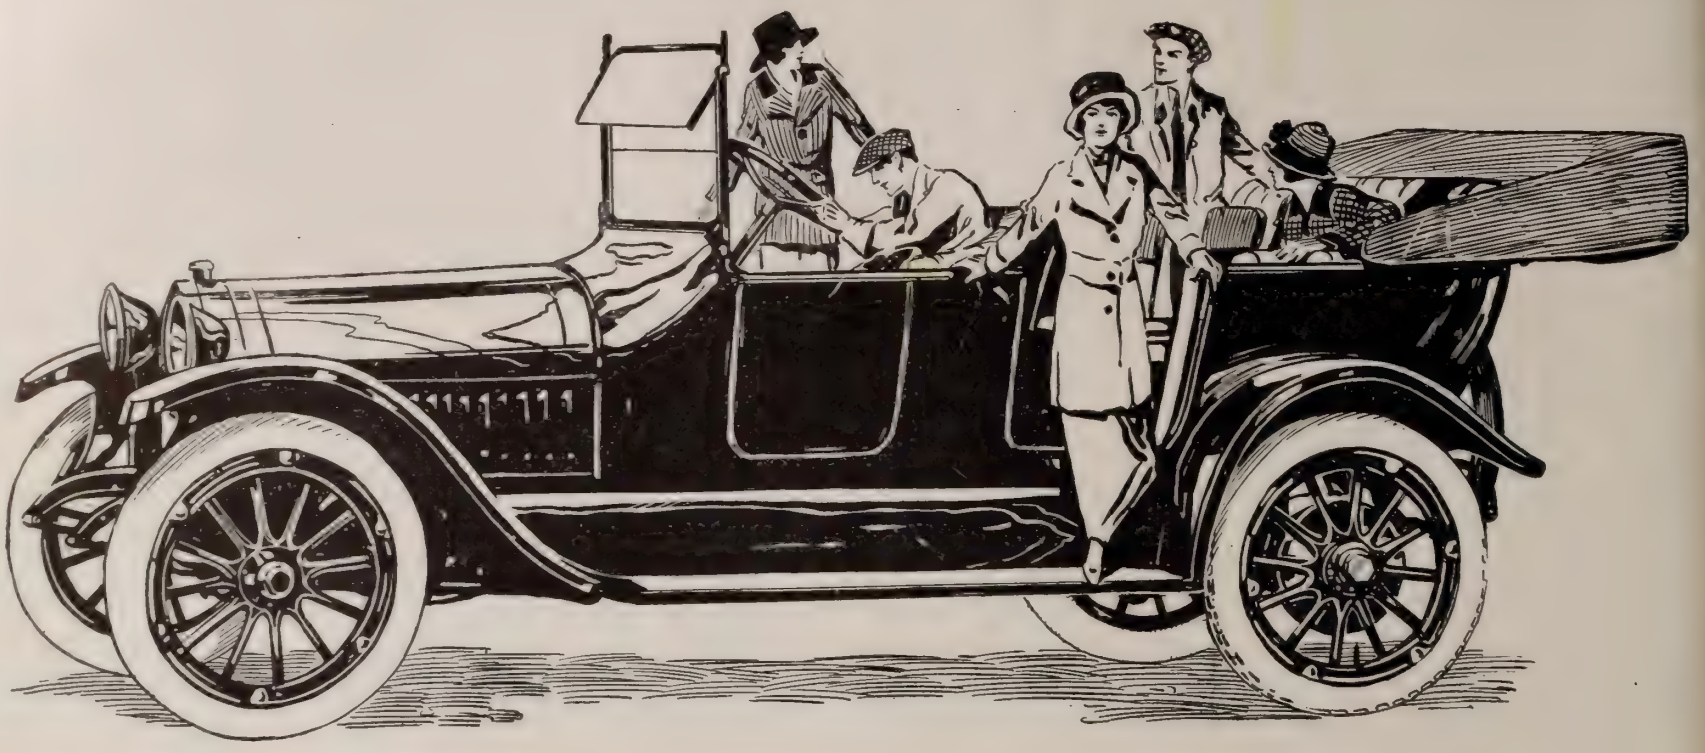
THE OLD GOWN

From picture made by Ewalt Harrison



The Studebaker Car is an Impressive Example of What Honesty of Purpose, Square Dealing and Good Manufacturing Can Accomplish in Sixty-two Years

Our fathers and grandfathers knew the name Studebaker.

For sixty-two years it has meant American vehicles honestly and sturdily built.

For sixty-two years farm and city homes have known Studebaker as the name for dollar-for-dollar value.

These sixty-two years Studebaker has grown enormously, in reputation, in production, in prosperity.

The little country blacksmith shop of the early fifties has developed into what we believe to be the largest, best equipped automobile plant in the world.

The production has grown to more than 1000 motor cars every week in the year.

But during all these years of development the original Studebaker ideal of manufacturing honest goods and selling them at honest prices has remained unchanged.

Today Studebaker means, in city and country, the acme of comfort and elegance — as well as the acme of money-worth.

Undoubtedly—along with the whole country—you have been amazed at the prices for the new Studebaker cars.

$985 for a big roomy five-passenger "Four" and $1385 for a Studebaker "Six" are extraordinary prices.

They would be extraordinary prices for just a "good" car.

They are truly amazing prices when they carry with them the Studebaker name—the Studebaker Reputation—Studebaker Quality and the Studebaker Guarantee.

Yet they are thoroughly sound, conservative, safe prices —safe for the manufacturer—safe for the buyer.

And they have been made possible for these reasons—

First: There is the huge volume of Studebaker production.

More than 55,000 Studebaker cars manufactured and sold during the last eighteen months—with a schedule for the present year calling for a minimum of 1000 a week—

Second: Studebaker cars are manufactured complete in Studebaker plants.

Studebaker motors, springs, bodies, tops, drop forgings are all made in Studebaker plants.

Special formulæ for Studebaker steels are worked out, and the steels are analyzed and tested in Studebaker laboratories.

Studebaker gears, axles, transmissions are all manufactured and heat treated in Studebaker plants.

And this completeness of Studebaker manufacture means not only better, stronger, longer lasting cars—

But in addition it means the saving of the parts-maker's profit—the waste and extravagance of the "assembled" or semi-manufactured car.

The Studebaker Corporation divides its profits not with parts-makers—but with the buyers of Studebaker cars.

That is why Studebaker prices are full $500 less than you would expect to pay for Studebaker quality.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many year's standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Independence Belge

HISTORY has been made rapidly in the last week, perhaps more rapidly than ever heretofore. On Friday, ugust 21, the advance guard of the rman army took peaceable pos- ssion of the Belgian capital, Brus- s.

A couple of days before, the seat government, the archives and the yal family had been moved to ntwerp to prevent their falling into e hands of the enemy, it being reseen that Brussels would shortly ss into the hands of the Germans.

Much credit is due to the Ameri- n minister at Brussels, as he con- buted greatly to make the entry peaceable one. The burgomaster the town had at first some idea of rricading the streets and resisting e Germans with the aid of the civil ard, a sort of civic militia, of ubtful value at best, and abso- ely useless to oppose to trained oops. From this the official was ssuaded by our representative, o also took a discreet and diplo- atic part in arranging the modus vendi arrived at between the Ger- an commander and the civic au- orities.

This arrangement provided for the stalling of a German garrison of 00 men, to be quartered in the y; for free passage of German oops through the city; such requisi- ns as might be made of supplies to be promptly furnished and to be paid for cash; the inhabitants, public and private property to be respected, and the ntrol of civic affairs to be left in the hands of the municipal authorities.

The German commander further issued a proclamation to the inhabitants rning them against committing any acts of aggression, and stating that y such would be summarily punished, as is usual, by death.

These preliminaries being completed, the German troops made an orderly trance into the town. The main body of the troops did not remain long in e city, but soon departed southwardly. During the next two or three days russels was repeatedly traversed by bodies of German troops, on their way the indicated positions on the battle line then forming to the southward.

Since this time Brussels has been very quiet, its people, as far as circum- ances permit, are resuming their usual occupations and the city is to a large gree taking on a normal aspect. There has been no report of any friction th the alien garrison.

As regards the fines imposed by the Germans on the various captured towns, may be said that there is nothing in the rules of war that such impositions ansgress. In recent wars the custom has been more honored in the breach an in the observance, though up to and including the Napoleonic wars it was ual and customary.

The German advance, at the time of the capture of Brussels, through Belgium, was operating practically on two lines. The first, beginning at the German border, ran southwest down the valley of the Meuse to a point near Namur, and the second began at the same point and ran westward through northern Belgium to Brussels.

BRIDGE AND CITADEL OF NAMUR

These indications of positions are, of course, very general, but it is my experience that the average reader obtains a really better idea of a position from a simple, general statement than from one elaborate and detailed.

A part of the Belgian army, which had been opposing the German army in its advance on Brussels, retreated from its position of opposition, in a general northwesterly direction, taking up a new position near the fortifications of Antwerp, thus obtaining the advantage of using that fortress as a base from which to operate on that portion of the German forces which, by the subsequent movements of the German troops, became the rearguard of the German right wing of the entire line of battle.

During the last few days this portion of the Belgian army has shown commendable activity. Particularly is such activity commendable in view of the rough handling it had previously received. On more than one occasion it has attacked the German troops, one particularly severe fight taking place about the middle of the week near Malines. The effect of these attacks is to oblige the Germans to keep a larger force in the vicinity than they otherwise would, thus weakening their main battle line in the south.

Antwerp itself has during the past week been several times attacked by bomb-dropping Zeppelins, one of which did considerable damage. The Belgian Government has protested these attacks to the neutral Powers as a violation of the declaration of the Hague Convention of 1909. The declaration in issue is as follows:

> Both contracting Powers agree to prohibit extending to the close of the third peace conference the discharge of projectiles and explosives from balloons, or by any new methods of a similar nature.

Both Germany and France voted against this declaration, and though it was adopted neither of them signed the declaration, nor did Servia and Japan. The declaration itself presents ambiguities of meaning, and, further, it is not clear whether nations not signing the declaration are bound thereby. Under the old rule, Antwerp, being a fortified place, would be subject to bombardment, on notice. By analogy, it would seem under the old state of things that she would be subject to being (I invent the word) Zeppelinized, also on notice. This notice the Germans claim to have given. The other part of the Belgian army which had opposed the German advance through northern Belgium after the fall of Brussels went south and is supposed to have joined the Allies.

A portion of the German force traversing Brussels, composed almost entirely of cavalry, continued to the westward, and threatened the various towns along its line of march, such as Bruges, Ghent, etc., its apparent objective being Ostend. Before, however, it succeeded in capturing this town, our English cousins, alarmed at the prospect of the Germans obtaining a port on the channel, whence they could menace England, and more particularly London, by a Zeppelin attack, and also make raids on channel shipping, sent a large force of marines thither, and are now, it is said, sending a larger force of regular troops to the town in an effort to hold it. The possession of this place may, hereafter, be a matter of considerable importance.

The main body of the German army, after crossing Brussels, turned to the southward and became the German extreme left wing in the battle which was about to be delivered. Its position, roughly, at first was from a point a little to the south of Brussels, through Hal, to a point in front of Charleroi.

In the meantime the German army in the valley of the Meuse continued the reduction of the Liège forts, and moving southward in the direction of Namur, bridged the Meuse, at several places, for purposes hereafter referred to and generally secured the valley, assuming its final position in line of battle, stretching from a little to the north of Namur westward towards the position assumed by the German army which had come southward from Brussels, but not quite reaching it.

The gap thus left was filled up by troops from a large German force which had been quietly concentrating in the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg for some time, and which sent a strong force to the westward, which force advancing to the Meuse valley, crossed the bridges erected by the army of the Meuse already referred to, and advancing to the westward filled up the gap above mentioned between the Brussels army and the Meuse army and generally strengthened the German lines in that direction.

The main force of this army of Luxemburg then formed the line of battle connecting the army of the Meuse with another German army, under the command of the Crown Prince, which, with its center at Metz, extended east and west from that place.

On the extreme east of the German line of battle, after passing the break therein necessarily caused by the injutting of the Vosges Mountains, was a strong force of Germans and Austrians with Strassburg as base. Such was approximately the German line of battle at the moment the great battle of Saturday, Sunday and Monday began (August 21-24). Its length was, roughly speaking, about two hundred and fifty miles, and it was located in the territory of Belgium, Luxemburg and the German Empire. The soil of France had then not been touched by German foot.

On the side of the Allies the situation was roughly this: The line of battle began with a left wing running from a little to the southwest of Brussels, slightly outlapped by the German right wing, in a curve southeasterly to Charleroi, thence easterly to Namur, thence and still easterly in a general sense to Neufchâteau in the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, thence more to the southerly to Champenou and Cirey.

In Alsace and Lorraine, a French army had made a comparatively successful campaign, and had advanced some fifteen miles into German territory, so here the line of battle ran well out in German territory from the Vosges Mountains through Saarburg, through Colmar and Muelhausen, to Belfort.

The English troops were on the left of the allied lines, and are supposed to have been in number somewhere in the vicinity of 100,000.

As to the total number of combatants on each side it is impossible to speak with any great degree of accuracy. Excited and imaginative gentlemen of the daily press have placed the German strength at as high as a million and a half, and on the side of the Allies as high as a million and a quarter. In my own personal opinion—and it is of course purely an opinion—these figures are entirely too high. I should put, without going into the processes by which I arrive at the result, the total German force in the vicinity of 700,000, and the force of the Allies at about 800,000. It seems to me clear that the Allies outnumbered the Germans, but that owing to their far greater mobility the Germans were able to quickly concentrate and hurl masses in superior numbers at the critical points, so that they seem to outnumber the Allies, though in fact not being so numerous.

REMARKABLE ASSEMBLAGE OF ENGLISH WAR VESSELS AND AIR CRAFT

The battle did not begin on any one day, in fact, it is inaccurate to call it a battle. It was a series of battles, yet in a strategic sense the whole series of engagements form one whole, and will be more readily understood in its results if looked at in that way.

Hence, I shall not attempt to describe the ebb and flow of the combats on the various points of the long line, but will confine myself—having some regard for the patience of my readers, and the amount of space which this paper can devote to this subject—to giving as clear an idea as I am able to of the positions of the two armies when the battle was finished, say on Wednesday, the 26th.

We then find the German line of invasion with its extreme right resting on Lille in France, and with that town said to be in its possession, thence running eastwardly to Maubeuge in France, another fortified town, which is now also said to have fallen, thence eastwardly to a point near Givet, a French border garrison town, the possession of which seems to be in dispute, thence again eastwardly, following fairly closely the French border to a point northwest of Nancy, and thence into France, southeastwardly to Nancy (the fate of this town is in doubt), and thence still in France and again eastwardly through Luneville, which the Germans hol and thence to St. Dié in the Vosges, and then along the German border, and, perhaps, a litt over on the German side from Belfort.

This sounds like the description of a piece of re estate in a deed, but it can be easily traced on t map, and those of my readers who are really inte ested will, no doubt, give themselves the trouble do so.

In words, the results can be thus expressed: T fighting has been transferred almc completely to French soil, the Germa have advanced forward on the avera something like twenty-five miles, hurli the Allies back an equal distance.

This advance breaks the first line French defenses, and the Allies are n engaged in concentrating on the seco line, making from time to time, isolat offensive moves to cover this concentr tion.

The troops on both sides, with the e ception of one French corps d'armée, ha fought bravely and well, the Turc particularly distinguishing themselves Charleroi, one battalion of them havi lost 650 men of its war effective of 7 The English troops have done the du which one naturally expects from t troops of that nation.

The conclusion, however, that is forc on one from a consideration of the m tary features of the battle is that t allied troops cannot support the shc of the German infantry advance. After all, spite of the great improvements in artillery, t introduction of air craft in fighting, and all t other innovations which have been introduced warfare, the fact remains as true today as ever was, that the infantry arm is the queen arm, a that wars or campaigns will be decided by that ar

From the character of the wounds reported, astonishing fact can be deduced. Contrary to pectation, there has been much hand-to-hand fig ing. It had been supposed very generally that day of hand-to-hand fighting was over, but the in cations are that this is not so.

The losses on both sides have been very heavy some reasonably competent authorities estim them at about sixty thousand for each army.

It is impossible to see how, unless a miracle worked, the German plan of campaign is going be prevented from succeeding. As the instrum of this miracle the English troops are in advan designated. For I am very much afraid that French troops are not up to the requirements their task, from their showing so far.

Lord Kitchener's speech in the House of Co mons the other night indicates very clearly t the English Government has no illusions as rega the magnitude of the task before it, which in its is a step towards successfully meeting the em gency. While these things had been happening the main line of battle, stre forces of German cavalry h been busy behind the All left wing, feeling out strength of the French forts far down as Calais. This mo ment is indicative of a mo ment in force on these poi and others further down coast a little later, the object ing to prevent the further la ing of English troops thereat

There may be another moti It will be remembered that of Germany's problems in t war is how to fight the Engli and French war fleets on la The capture and destruction the French naval ports would one factor in the solution of t problem. Of course, this merely a suggestion.

What the French Gove ment thinks of the present st of the campaign may be reas ably deduced from the fa that it is sending the woun to the south of France, that steps are being taken provision Paris.

While these things have b taking place along the Fre and German borders, many teresting things have been h pening along the frontier which Russia and Germ meet.

The Czar, contrary to ex tation, has succeeded, or least partly succeeded, in ting his army mobilized, and made an advance in reasona force on Eastern Prussia.

NORTHFIELD'S SUMMER CONFERENCE

LATEST PANORAMIC VIEW OF THE NORTHFIELD SCHOOLS, EAST NORTHFIELD, MASS.

A FITTING climax to the first week of the great General Conference for Christian Workers was a meeting devoted to the Northfield Schools. Mr. W. R. Moody presided, and gave a most interesting outline of the work done by his father, Dwight L. Moody, and how the great evangelist became interested in establishing these schools.

It may be interesting here to note the origin and growth of this great Northfield work. It is said that in the summer of 1875 Mr. Moody was visiting his widowed mother at the old homestead, after a two years' absence in evangelistic work in Great Britain. The thought of a permanent home in his native place had not at that time occurred to him, for he had expected to continue his work in Chicago. But one day Widow Moody's hens trespassed on her neighbor's fence, and a complaint in no uncertain terms was immediately lodged against the culprits. Mr. Moody thought of buying a few acres of his neighbor's land which adjoined his mother's, thereby saving further annoyance to any one; but when he proposed it shortly afterwards, the sale of a part of the property was flatly refused. Mr. Moody inquired how much the owner would take for the whole farm of twelve acres. Receiving the reply, "Thirty-five hundred," Mr. Moody, with his characteristic impulsiveness, said, "Done!"

The Girls' School had its beginning in 1878, and has grown to such proportions that there is now an enrolment of more than six hundred students, and it is necessary to refuse several hundred applicants every year. The Mount Hermon School for Boys was established in 1881, in response to what Mr. Moody believed a widespread demand, and subsequent events proved he was right. The fundamental principles of both schools has always been at least two hours of manual labor each day for every student; two recitations every week in the English Bible; and the payment by the students in the form of tuition of one-half of the cost of maintenance of the schools, the other half being raised by voluntary contributions. Last year there were no less than five thousand of these.

High-tide in the conference was reached the second Sunday, and that regardless of the intense heat and humid weather. In addition to the regular attendance, a great number of people came in from the surrounding towns and villages to attend the Sunday services. The auditorium was filled to overflowing for the morning service. There were about fifty ministers on the platform, with close on to two hundred members in the choir, of whom about one-half were students from the Northfield Schools. The service prayer was offered by Professor J. Hope Moulton, it being his first appearance at the Conference. In his prayer he laid special emphasis on the death of Mrs. Woodrow Wilson.

At the same hour the usual Sunday service for children was held at Round Top, the speaker being the Rev. George E. Eddy, of Wyoming, N. J.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, preached at the evening service in the Auditorium, taking for his text the fifth chapter of Revelation, verse 12. On Monday morning at 8.45, Rev. A. T. Robertson, D.D., of the Baptist Seminary, Louisville, Ky., one of the best known students of New Testament Greek in this country, continued his Bible lectures, which lasted throughout the entire week. Dr. Robertson's meetings are always well and enthusiastically attended.

At the 9.30 A.M. hour Rev. John A. Hutton, of Bellhaven Free Presbyterian Church, Glasgow, delivered a series of lectures on "The Deepening Recognition of Christ." The people of Northfield needed no introduction to Mr. Hutton, and it was with marked regret that his visit was cut short on account of his having to return to his pastorate because of the war. At the 10.30 service, Professor J. Hope Moulton, the famous archeologist of Victoria College, Manchester, England, delivered his series of five lectures on the "Egyptian Rubbish Heaps," which proved to be of great interest and of immense value to Bible students. Professor Moulton is associated with Professor George Milligan of Glasgow University in preparing a book entitled The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-Literary Sources. Heretofore Professor Moulton has confined himself solely to writings on the grammar of the Greek Testament, his book having been translated into German, and dedicated to the theological faculty of the Berlin University, who gave him their doctorate in theology. Professor Moulton says: "I might add that in the preface I expressed very strongly my sentiments of admiration and indebtedness to German scholarship, which it was one of my great objects to make known in England, and my warm sentiments of friendship toward the German nation. These words read very sadly now."

One of the strongest speakers of the Conference was Rev. Robert F. Y. Pierce, D.D., of the Second Baptist Church of New York City, who stands at the head as a blackboard illustrator of Bible lessons.

It was with deep regret to every one that the Rev. J. Stuart Holden, of Portman Square Church, London, and a missioner in the Church of England, delivered his last address, as he too had to cut short his visit because of the war. Rev. Charles Brown, former president of the Baptist Union, and pastor of the Ferme Park Church, London, and who has the reputation of being one of the best child-sermon preachers in England, addressed the children's service in the Music Hall, and also a service at the Auditorium. Dr. Brown, by his great simplicity and earnestness, has made a number of friends during the three conferences at which he has spoken in previous years, and his messages have been the means of great blessing. This year is no exception.

Several very interesting meetings of the Woman's Home Missionary Society were held in Russell Sage Chapel, Mrs. George W. Sweger, of Lancaster, Pa., presiding, at which time Mrs. J. A. Ely, of Shanghai, China; Mrs. Harry E. Monroe, of Washington, D. C., and Sister Marie, of the Mary J. Drexel House, Philadelphia, delivered interesting talks, and told of the many needs of the missionary societies both at home and in foreign fields. Sister Marie is a Moravian deaconess, and wears the dress copied after that of the women of Germany in the early part of the eighteenth century. Starting in the small town of Kaiserswerth, the work of the deaconesses has now spread into every part of the civilized world. It is a work primarily of mercy, and in the present European war there will be hundreds of deaconesses serving as nurses and giving first aid to the wounded. Sister Marie's addresses are delivered in a simple and sincere way, and were much appreciated.

Sunday, the last day of the Conference, came to a close with a series of services which filled practically the entire day. The audiences were large, and the interest pronounced. The morning service in the Auditorium was addressed by the Rev. John Thomas of Liverpool, England, who until recently was pastor of one of the leading Baptist Churches in that city, and spoke on "Christ's Mediatorial Exaltation."

Rev. Charles Inglis of London addressed the children at Round Top at 2.30 in the afternoon. Mr. Inglis is always heard with interest by old and young. He is an evangelist of note, and only recently returned from Scotland, where he was associated with Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., who this spring closed a most successful campaign in Glasgow.

Rev. Sam Higginbottom, a missionary of the Presbyterian Board at Allahabad, India, delivered an address at the Sunset meeting. Mr. Higginbottom is always received with enthusiasm by the people at Northfield, who are much interested in him as a product of the Mount Hermon School, and especially in his work among the lepers of India. The Round Top meetings were conducted each day by Mr. Higginbottom, and no more impressive gatherings were held during the entire Conference. At four o'clock in the afternoon, Rev. John R. Davies, of Philadelphia, preached in the Auditorium, his subject being "The Transfiguration," and the closing service of the Conference was held at eight o'clock in the evening at the Auditorium, Rev. Charles Brown of London making the address.

*A SERMON BY REV. LEN G. BROUGHTON, D.D.

"Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, as becometh saints." Eph. 4: 1 and 5: 3

IN STUDYING this subject, there is nothing that serves us so well, perhaps in all the Bible, as the Epistle to the Ephesians. The whole of this epistle is an exposition of the heights and depths of sainthood. There are six chapters in the book. The first three reveal to us the nature of sainthood; the last three reveal to us the life of a saint. If I were asked to state which of these two divisions of the book I regarded as most important, I should say the first. I should say so because it is much more important for us to be than it is for us to do. A man can do and never be, but a man can't always be and never do. Our doing eventually is the outcome of our being, and if we are saints we shall eventually live as becometh saints.

In writing to the Galatian Christians, the apostle Paul states a bit of his own personal experience. He says, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." In this bit of personal experience the apostle embodies, as I see it, three classes of professing Christians.

In the first place, he embodies the negative Christian, the man who lives the negative life. If we approach him with some suggestion that seems a bit lively, that is, a bit different from the spirit of the prayer meeting, he meets us at once with the statement that he is "crucified with Christ," and he cannot therefore take part in anything that does not bear the stamp of the Cross.

Then Paul embodies a class of Christians who are all positive in their life. If we approach them with some suggestion for the prayer meeting, they reply to us that they live, and believe in life, that their religion is to a great extent made up of positive things, of things that they do.

Again, there is another class, and I would that this class could be made a great deal larger. It is the class of Christians whose life is made up of both negative and positive things. They are "crucified with Christ," but they live in the midst of the throbbing affairs of everyday life, and they have brought their "crucified," negative life and their positive life together by the Cross of Jesus. If I had a blackboard I think I should express it like this: Negative — Positive = Christ and the Cross. For it is Christ and his Cross that make the negative and the positive occupy the proportionate place in the Christian life and service that they are desired to occupy.

Saints: God-Possessed

So we find here in the Epistle to the Ephesians, the apostle in the first three chapters is setting forth the position of sainthood. He is saying in these three chapters what it is to be a saint. Then, in the last three chapters, his effort is to get men to live in accordance with the privileges that they have as saints. And about it all I would put here and there touches that would indicate mastery over the flesh. That is the saint! The saint is not a man who is beyond temptation, nor is he a man in any sense removed from the throbbing demands of life. He is the man of all men who is subject to temptation, and yet, by the power of the indwelling Spirit of Christ, is able to master it and keep it down.

Some time ago I was preaching in a certain town in Wales. I was told that the whole of that town—a town of considerable importance—was owned by one man, a certain lord. Yet I was told that that lord, though he owned all that town, never possessed a single foot of it. It was possessed by the people who had obtained the leases from his grandfather. That man, though he owned the whole of the town, could not enter a house in it, could not pick up a pebble by right. Though the town belonged to him, he could not order a single thing to be done. He owned it, but did not possess it. A short time after I was there—indeed, preparations were being made for it while I was there—that man came into possession of his property, and soon began to work out the changes that he had seen fit all the while to make.

It is exactly so in regard to ourselves. God owns us in our unregenerated state as much as he owns us when we are saints. There is no difference whatever in God's ownership of the race out of Christ and in Christ. He owns us by right of creation. We are his. But we are not possessed of God until we yield to him according to his terms in Jesus Christ on the cross. Then, and not till then, does he come into possession. So the apostle here reminds us at the very beginning that we are his redemption through Christ Jesus—his possession. He redeems that which properly belongs to him through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Then again, in chapter 2, verse 10, he tells us that we are God's "workmanship." "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." "Workmanship." To my mind here is suggested the figure of a musical instrument; perhaps it is a great organ. Some time ago, a great organ-builder in Hartford, Connecticut, told me the most expensive part of the upkeep of his establishment—and it is a great establishment, one of the greatest in the world—was the payment of salaries to expert organ-builders to keep abreast with the progress of invention, and thus perfect more and more the organ, which, as he said, is still very imperfect.

Now, as I see it, it is like this with us as saints of God. In the first place, we are his workmanship, and possessing us, he begins his workmanship of us, perfecting us more and more until the day of Jesus Christ. And all this is for the purpose of bringing us to the place where, as the great organ of God, he can make music in the midst of the disharmony of the world. The purpose of sainthood is not simply to make one feel secure and happy. The purpose of sainthood is that God through us may bless the world. If we are not a blessing to the world, if God is not making music through our living, if we are not diffusing the charms and blessings the world needs in the midst of its sorrows and its sighs and its suffering, there is something the matter. The first touch on God's organ, in his workmanship, is made when we are redeemed by the grace of Christ. The moment that we said "Yes" to Jesus, and became God's possession, he began to work upon us. And all through the years that have intervened he has been at work upon us, using various tools, tools that we did not understand and that we do not yet understand, but all the time working upon us, perfecting us, making us more and more instruments of beauty and of power and of blessing. That is the purpose of our sainthood.

Then he tells us in the second chapter, twenty-second verse, and the third chapter, seventeenth verse, that we are God's "habitation." "In whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit." Man, when he is redeemed, is indwelt by Jesus Christ. We become through redemption first the property possessed of God, and second, we become the property that is worked upon by God, and third, we become the property that is indwelt by God.

The Vocation of Saints

This brings us to the words of our text: "Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, as becometh saints." The injunction of the apostle Paul here is that since we are saints we should walk worthy of our guest. What a strong motive for righteous living this is! The figure here suggested to me is that of a householder entertaining a distinguished guest. The apostle would say to us, "Since you are saints and Christ dwells within you, walk worthy of him." As your guest, give him the proper entertainment, see that every desire of his in your heart and life is met.

We are to endeavor to please him in our business life. And, may I say, to endeavor to please him in business life just as much as in church life. We are to please him in our social life, and we are to endeavor to please him in our social life just as much as in business life or in church life. We are to endeavor to please him, if you will, in our political life. We are to endeavor to please him in our political life by voting, as far as we can, just like we pray. If we pray, "Thy kingdom come," we are to vote for the issues and measures that will bring in the kingdom of heaven. And then we are to endeavor to please him in our home life. Not to be satisfied with living pleasantly when we are up against competitors in the world of business or society or politics or government and then go home and reveal the exact opposite to be unpleasant and grouchy and mean. Nor are we to be pleasant when out at entertainments, at evening dinners, and other functions, and then be cold and snap when at home and no one there but ourselves!

What the apostle means is that we, as saints—for we are saints if we are Christian men and women—are to live in our contact with one another and with the world, in all things "as becometh saints." Christ desires to reign in every department of our lives, and by so doing he desires to enable us to realize the full privileges of the position of our sainthood—and the world has yet to see the man who has realized the full privilege of his sainthood.

Behold, I Stand at the Door

Let me close with a supposition which will perhaps reveal my meaning more than anything else that I could say. Let me suppose that you have invited me, any one of you, to your home as a guest to spend a week. When I arrive you take me into my room, and you say, "Now you can be perfectly at home here; everything in this room can be just as you please. Do what you please. Have the windows shut if you please, or have them open if you please. Light the fire if you please, put it out if you please." So far this is very comforting. But after a time I get a bit tired in the room. I look out in the garden and I see the flowers blooming and the green grass, and hear the birds singing; and I go for a walk. When I get out there I am met by my host with a look that tells me without a word being spoken that I am not expected to be on the lawn. So I go back to my room, and I say, "Well, I am king here, can't anybody come in here to molest me?" But I get tired of that. I go again downstairs. I hear some one playing the piano. The moment I get in the room I catch the eye of my hostess, who tells me at once, "You are not expected here; this is the drawing-room; you were told to stay in your own room and be happy if you can"; and I go back. I get very restless and think I shall certainly be allowed in the library; I will go there and read the books and papers. I get in the library and am soon met by my host, who gives me a look that says, "You are not expected in the library." Then I think of the kitchen; I go there, and am ordered out at once. Finally I think I will go to the stables and have fellowship with the horses and dogs. When I get there I am told I have no business in the stables. I go back and pack my bag, and, as fast as I can make time, I leave the place. I was given a hearty welcome to the part of the house in which I was told that I was free, but the very limitations put upon me by my host and hostess make me feel anything else but kinship, make me feel I am a slave. The thought of being limited in the house where I was told I was welcome in itself is prison.

Now, if I understand the teaching of the last three chapters of Ephesians, and if I understand the teaching of our Lord throughout his message, it is that he, as the guest of our hearts, will not be limited; he cannot be. Hand over the whole life to Christ! Let him in, and then he will put his finger upon the place that we need to be guarded most. He will not put out anything that is needed. He knows the need; he knows how far the need can be gratified. But, blessed be God, if he is in all the chambers, if he is supreme in all the house, he will elect the place and time in which he will restrain.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, September 13. John 6: 35. "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on me shall never thirst." The remarks of Jesus about the Bread which God had sent down from heaven seem to have impressed the Jews. They no longer address him as "Rabbi," but "Lord." They understand that he is referring to himself when he speaks of the Bread of God, but they still regard that Bread as something distinct from himself, some miraculous food which he will supply in a still more wonderful manner than he did the loaves and fishes. Jesus now tells them that he himself is that bread, and that the work of believing, of which he had spoken to them, means to lay hold of him as a hungry person eagerly receives food or a thirsty person water, and by assimilating him, to quench the insufferable craving of their hearts. Jesus here uses the expression "come to me." Physically, they had done so that very morning; now he invites their souls to come to him. Let them say with their whole heart: "This Jesus is bread from heaven for my soul. All my longing is stilled, now that I have him. I was faint and weak, he has made me strong; I was burning up in the fire that my accusing conscience had kindled in me, now I am at ease and peace. Now that I have Jesus, I have the fullest satisfaction. Jesus is and shall forever be my all-sufficient portion."

MONDAY, September 14. John 6: 36. "But I said unto you, That ye also have seen me, and believe not." With a melancholy change in his voice, we imagine, the Lord must have turned to the Jews in a very personal manner and told them that his self-manifestation was wasted on them, as long as they chose to walk by sight rather than by faith. They had seen him, oh, yes. What had they seen? A wonderful man, a great prophet, a rabbi, a God-like being. He has told them again and again that the Son of man, this human being which they saw before them, is the Lord of heaven and their Redeemer-God. And that they believed not. Episodes like this, of which we find many in the New Testament, ought to put a quietus on the claims of those who say they would be believers in Jesus if they could see and hear him. If faith were the logical result of a physical inspection of the person of Jesus, there should not have been a single unbeliever in all those regions which the Lord traversed during his earthly ministry; there should have been no apostasy like that of Judas, no lapse like Peter's, no skepticism like Thomas'. We see, then, that, even in the days of his flesh, the persons who truly accepted Jesus as the Son of God and their Saviour had to rest their faith on his word and obtained their faith from his word.

TUESDAY, September 15. John 6: 37-39. "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but raise it up again at the last day." The melancholy reflection of Jesus which we noted in the preceding verse does not signify that he is despairing of his mission among men. Through his work the will of the Father is being carried out, no matter who believes in him. Those that come to him by sincere faith Jesus regards as a gift from his Father. It is God who in his own way disposes men's hearts by the Gospel to receive the Son. And with such as the Father gives him the Son declares himself satisfied. Though a complete person himself, distinct from the Father, and though possessing a will of his own, Jesus in his official capacity, as heaven's messenger of salvation to man, subjects his will and work completely to the Father who sent him. He is not come to set up a counter dominion to that of God, but to exhibit to men by his teaching and acts how graciously and grandly the Father means to rule them by the Son. If men will only entrust themselves to him, they will find that their highest interests in time and eternity are fully taken care of by Jesus. He will give them a safe shelter in the dangers of the present life and will usher them into the happiness of the life to come. For this purpose he came down from heaven. How great must be the love of our Father, if he has thus made a humble servant of his Son!

WEDNESDAY, September 16. John 6: 40. "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." Why should the Lord utter the same sentiment twice in two successive verses? Look closely and see whether it is really the same. In the preceding text, Christ has merged his own will completely in that of the Father. In this text he declares that the Father has no will regarding men except that which Jesus declares. All the world is directed to Jesus as the source of life. Whoever sees the Son, not only with the eyes of the flesh—which was the privilege of a few persons only—but who sees him so as to believe on him and who casts himself entirely on Jesus, shall have everlasting life. He shall have it now in its beginning in a state of grace. For the life of a believer, though it is lived amid shortcomings, vicissitudes, and temptations of many kinds, is essentially different from the temporal and natural life of unregenerate men; it is a spiritual and heavenly life, in essence akin to that which those live who passed into the eternal state. And when the believer quits these transitory scenes, in the hour of death, the life that is in him by faith swells into that fulness which comes with the realization of every hope which his believing heart cherished. His soul is completely filled with the intuitive knowledge of the glory of God whom he beholds face to face. All this is the Father's will regarding us, and all this the Father wants us to seek nowhere else than in Christ.

THURSDAY, September 17. John 6: 43, 44. "Murmur not among yourselves. No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day." The Lord's utterances concerning the heavenly origin of his mission and the finality of his message had amazed the Jews. They knew this Speaker to be of lowly parentage. How dare this carpenter's son from Nazareth assert his equality with the Father in heaven and tell them that they, the chosen race, are dependent on his mercy? Intolerable conceit! Blasphemy! Out upon such sacrilegious braggadocio! Thus they were grumbling while Jesus looked on. He is not amazed at their rebellion against his teaching. It is only another proof of the truth of what he has declared before, viz., that faith in Christ is not of man. The Father who sent the Son to men draws men unto the Son. In every case where a person comes to Christ, a divine influence has been at work, and the faith of any person is the product of that influence. There is no other way of coming to Christ. Luther taught Christians to confess this truth, thus: "I believe that I cannot by my own reason or strength believe in Jesus Christ, my Lord, or come to him, but the Holy Ghost has called me by the Gospel." That is the drawing of the Father, the mighty energies that emanate from the word of reconciliation, the Gospel of peace. Unbelievers may resist this power of God unto their salvation to their last breath, and defeat the purpose of their Father in heaven; but every believer professes here and hereafter that the Lord has loved him and drawn him.

FRIDAY, September 18. John 6: 45-47. "It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me. Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father. Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me hath everlasting life." If the Jews had been shocked by the remarks of Jesus regarding the drawing of the Father, that was due to their ignorance of the teaching which God had conveyed to them by the prophets of old. Jesus had uttered no new doctrine. If, as is likely, this discourse was spoken on the Sabbath at the synagogue, the Scripture lesson for the day had reminded them that God's people are God-taught. With each and every one of them that are his, God has his way, to bring him to a full intelligence of the things that make for his peace here in time and hereafter in eternity. He teaches them, and that is the same thing as when he draws them. But so as not to leave the impression that the teaching or drawing of the Father is effected by some immediate and mysterious contact between God and man, as when God inspired the prophets, the Lord declares that those who learn of the Father do not see the Father, do not receive a special manifestation from him. There is only One who has seen the Father, Christ, and through him the Father teaches and draws men. In the strongest terms, Jesus assures the Jews that those who make trial of his teaching will find themselves caught in the loving embrace of their Father for a most intimate and endless union and fellowship.

SATURDAY, September 19. John 6: 48-51. "I am that bread of life. Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." When a kind teacher has to instruct a dull and unwilling pupil, he will with infinite patience repeat the lesson. He may set it forth at each repetition in slightly different terms, and if the subject is complex, he may cause the pupil to look at it from a new angle of vision and may make him see a new detail; but in the main it will always be the same lesson. Thus our Lord wrestles with the sluggish understanding and the froward will of the Jews. For the third and fourth time in quick succession, he has now told them that he is the Bread of life come out of heaven, immeasurably superior to the manna which Moses gave and which did not make the Israelites immune from death. But the Lord here adds a remark about his coming sacrifice. He is the Bread of life for sinners because he will give his flesh, that is, surrender his natural life to death, in order that by his dying he may secure life to the world. To receive Christ as the food and drink of the soul, then, it is necessary to believe in the atoning power of his death. Historical belief in his existence and in the records of his acts is insufficient for fully appropriating Christ as our life. Ethical belief in the moral excellency of his character and precepts is also insufficient. He alone eats and drinks Christ who takes up into his mind, will, and all his affections this assurance: that Christ, who offered himself to God as a sweet-smelling sacrifice, is his ransom and has effected his reconciliation with God.

GOSPEL BREVITIES FROM HERE AND THERE

—A READER OF THIS journal, Mrs. G. D., of Spirit Lake, Iowa, writes: "A lady friend called me over the phone the other night and said, 'I want to thank you for getting me interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.' I told her that it was through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that I was converted. I was a church member, but not a Christian, and through reading it I found Jesus Christ. Bless his name!"

A NEWLY DISCOVERED vaccine is said to have effected a cure in the cases of nine lepers at the Louisiana Home for Lepers. The Mission to Lepers keeps up a vigorous campaign for the betterment of this unfortunate class in all parts of the world. A bill has been introduced in Congress for the establishment of national institutions for lepers. The curative and relief work performed is supplemented by the most loving evangelistic service, and at the present time several missionaries to the lepers are home on furlough with encouraging accounts of the work in other lands.

—EVANGELIST A. J. FITT, of Denver, Colo., has just closed a four months' Gospel tent campaign in Colorado, Kansas and Missouri. The entire church life was greatly quickened as a result. Many men were among the converts.

THE LAYMEN'S MISSIONARY CONFERENCE

LAKE GENEVA, Wisconsin, was the scene of the fourth summer conference of the Laymen's Missionary Movement held from July 29 to August 2. The remarkable awakening of missionary enthusiasm among the men of today, finding its organized expression in the Laymen's Missionary Movement, has not been without striking results. Since the inception of the movement six years ago, the contributions of the churches to the missionary enterprise have more than doubled, according to a statement in a speech by J. Campbell White, in the opening meeting.

The purpose of this summer assembly was to bring together a company of chosen men from all over the country who, under the direction of skilled leaders, would acquire a clearer knowledge of the best methods of missionary education, and might return to their respective churches to promote with intelligence and enthusiasm a program of more efficient missionary instruction.

Two hundred and forty-six delegates registered, an increase of 132 over the previous year. These delegates represented sixteen different denominations, distributed as follows: Dunkards 2, Evangelical Synod 12, Southern Presbyterian 2, English Lutherans 7, Reformed of America 8, Reformed of United States 18, Disciples of Christ 16, Christian Church 3, Evangelical Association 12, Protestant Episcopal 2, M. E. Church, South, 2, Congregational 29, Presbyterians 51, Methodist Episcopal 63. The delegates were drawn from a wide area, covering sixteen States, Japan and the Philippine Islands.

The plan of the conference was to form study groups which met each day. Immigration, the New Home Missions, The Church of the Open Country, Mexico and The Call of the World were among the subjects discussed. Delegates were at liberty to choose the particular groups which they desired to join. The various denominations met each day to consider the best means of adapting to the particular denominational organization the policies and plans of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. These denominational and group studies were followed by round table conferences of all the groups meeting together to compare notes and discuss methods.

Every evening during the twilight hour vesper services were held on the lake front, addressed by missionary workers from Japan, India, Africa and the Philippines. On several days platform meetings were held addressed by such noted leaders as Charles R. Henderson of Chicago University, Dr. Hubert C. Herring of Boston, Rev. J. Campbell White and Rev. Wilbert White, president of the Bible Teachers' Training School of New York. The conference sermon on Sunday, August 2, was preached by Bishop Theodore Henderson of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

WILLIAM L. COLLIN.

SLAVERY IN YUCATAN

[The author of the following article, being obliged to revisit Yucatan, where he resided for fifteen years and had facilities denied to foreigners almost invariably, is unwilling to have his name appear. He suggests that the conditions of which he writes (conservatively, he affirms) might be ended if Congress were to prohibit the importation to this country of the products of slave labor; 95 per cent. of the hemp of Yucatan, he states, is sent here. He also urges the opportunity for Christian militancy in that land.—The Editors.]

TO GAIN an insight into the nature of the present struggle of the Mexican peon for physical and moral freedom, the actual condition of the Indians in Yucatan may be considered. The native Maya is the meekest and gentlest of all Mexican Indians; he is also held in more cruel and hopeless bondage than the others. There are in the State of Yucatan some 150,000 Maya slaves, owned by about two hundred masters, who cultivate the sisal hemp, a product chiefly imported into this country. Each Indian, man or boy, must perform a given daily task; if he falls behind in his task, he is flogged; if he runs away, he perishes in the wilderness, or if caught, he is often flogged to death. The average daily wage is twenty cents for twelve hours of work under a scorching sun. Food and drink are sold at the plantation store, the former high in price, the latter cheap, to keep the consumer's moral energy within desired limits. The family lives on most plantations in a miserable hut, generally offset by a most pretentious church. Religion imparted proclaims a God who has created two classes, master and slave; to work hard for and be obedient to the former leads to paradise; laziness and ambition lead to infernal tortures. Schools do not exist; the planters' chief agents are the priest, the lash and rum; no Christian missionary ever came to Yucatan plantations to teach the Maya faith, hope and temperance. The Indian says: "I drink to forget myself and to drown the miseries of my hopeless life."

Merida, the planters' capital, is a continuous display of barbarous splendor, while the surrounding hemp fields are a silent netherworld, peopled by shapeless, hopeless phantoms, the ghastly silence interrupted now and then by piteous shrieks from victims of the lash, and by howlings from a maddened brain, aglow with fiery liquor. The victims are locked up in cages, with which the plantations are well stocked, with all degrees of torture, darkness, vermin and creepy things. The gentle Indian, when sober, loves his wife and children, but all grow up under the baneful influence of lash, rum and a most un-Christian priest. Under this triple system the Maya is fast going to an early grave, and some of them seek peace in self-inflicted death. A slender youth of sixteen told the writer why he took to drink. His father, a tailor in a small town, had died; his mother began to ail; the son, to nurse his suffering parent, borrowed fifty dollars from a planter, and half as much went for a coffin and the decoration of a grave. The youthful debtor went to the planter's place to slave off the debt contracted, a hopeless task with fifteen cents in daily wages. He took to drink to forget the past and the hopeless future; one morning his body dangled from a tree, and at noon the vultures were fighting over the remains of what was once a loving gentle youth.

As the Maya slave is disappearing fast, the planters import human cattle from other parts of the Mexican republic. Twelve years ago, in beautiful Sonora, a vast stretch of fertile land, dotted with prosperous Yaqui farms, was confiscated by one of the ministers of President Porfirio Diaz. The manly Yaquis went to the mountains to fight the spoliators of their homes. To stamp out the spirit of rebellion, the wives, daughters and boys of these fighting men were transported to distant Yucatan and sold as slaves to fill the gaps left by the disappearing Mayas.

Thus, within two years, from the temperate clime of beautiful Sonora, more than twelve thousand human beings were shipped to the torrid fields of death-breeding Yucatan. The first consignment of these wretched Yaquis, four hundred and three women, boys and girls, was purchased by a prominent planter; for want of accommodation, these exiles were quartered in a shed, not large enough for sixty human beings. A few days after their installation in this unsanitary place, yellow, typhoid and other fevers began to decimate these new arrivals; many refused to eat, a few died from the wounds inflicted by the lash, and others killed their children and committed suicide. Two moons had not passed over this abode of horror, when the last victim of a once free and happy people was thrown a prey to vulture and plantation dog. The successive consignments were better treated, but nearly all of them died from nostalgia, fevers and exposure to the rays of a scorching sun. To-day, out of some twelve thousand human beings, but a few hundred are alive, and these are as hopeless as the native Maya.

Only three months ago, a powerful planter bought a new plantation; he ordered the wages prevailing on his new property reduced. Food prices being high, the Indians appealed, through their majordomo, a man opposed to flogging, to the owner for an increase in wages. The reply came with the arrival of fifty Federal soldiers, who imprisoned the ringleaders, of whom two "disappeared"; the rest were flogged. The soldiers remained two weeks on said plantation, and instructed the Indians how to work for starving wages. The humane majordomo was enlisted in the army to fight the rebels.

THE PERFECT GIFT

ONE day the wish went forth from the great King
To all the people round that they should bring
To him some special token of their love.
And so with many a gift they sought to prove
Their adoration. Frankincense and myrrh
And shining gold among those gifts there were,
Even as of old: and richest spikenard, sweet
As that which Mary poured on Jesus' feet;
Attar and musk and yellow sandal-wood
So fragrant at the heart from having stood
Age-long 'neath ripening suns; each precious stone
To all the world's great merchants ever known,
The ruby's blood, the diamond's prisoned fire,
And pearls as priceless as the queens desire,
Rare opals misty till the sun has kissed
To myriad hues, and melting amethyst;
Velvets and silks and rich embroideries,
Almonds and dates and all the fruit of trees;
What earth and man produce they sought to bring
And lay before the feet of their great King.

Then last of all that throng there slowly came
A man so very old and bent and lame
He scarce could walk. He eagerly held up
Before the King a little earthen cup
Filled with a brook's clear water to the brim.
Then kneeling by his Lord, he said to him:
"O blessed Christ! so hard life's burdens pressed
I could not once go forth with all the rest
To seek for thee some priceless gift. My way
Led past a little brook, and thrice each day
I drank from its clear water, and it gave Refreshment and new strength, and made me brave
To still go on. It was thy gift to men;
And so I only offer thee again
What is thine own. That which thou gavest me
Is all I have, dear Lord, to give to thee."

Then spoke the King. "My son, thy sayings prove Thou givest what is priceless—perfect love.
And who gives this with some small gift gives more
Than he who brings of his abundant store
And adds no love to it. Thy offering
Is precious as pure gold unto the King." A. M. G.

WAR SCATTERS PEACE CONFERENCE

THE International Church Peace Conference met at Constance, Germany, on August 2. One hundred and fifty delegates representing twelve nations had been chosen to attend the Conference, but, owing to the disturbed conditions in Europe, which was everywhere preparing for war, only 85 delegates reached Constance in time for the meeting. The nations represented were Great Britain (including Canada), Germany, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Norway, Belgium, the United States and France.

The American delegates were as follows: Representing the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America: Rev. Anson P. Atterbury, Rev. David Baines-Griffiths, Rev. W. C. Bitting, Rev. Jonathan C. Day, President Samuel Dickie, Canon George William Douglas, Professor Thomas C. Hall, Robert H. Gardner, Bishop E. R. Hendrix, Right Rev. M. W. Leibert, Rev. Frederick Lynch, Rev. D. Willard Lyon, Chancellor Henry M. Macracken, Rev. William Pierson Merrill, Rev. Philip S. Moxom, Dr. George W. Nasmyth, Bishop J. L. Nuelsen (of Zürich), Rev. T. T. Richards, Rev. Claudius B. Spencer, Rev. Charles L. Thompson, President Ezra Squier Tipple, Rev. James L. Tryon, Rev. George U. Wenner, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin and Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Council, and Rev. Sidney L. Gulick, representative on International Relations, Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, Rev. James C. Hall, Professor William I. Hull, Edwin D. Mead, A. F. Stearns, Frank F. Williams.

It would have been hardly possible to choose a more unpropitious time for a Peace Conference. Europe was on the verge of war. Four great nations had mobilized their armies, and the opening sounds of the great conflict were momentarily expected. Conditions were so threatening that the French delegates left the Conference while the proceedings were under way.

One of the first acts of the Conference was the sending of a message to the rulers of Europe and the President of the United States solemnly appealing to them to avert a war "between millions of men amongst whom friendship and common interests have been steadily growing, and thereby save from disaster Christian civilization and assert the power of the Christian spirit in human affairs." Resolutions were also adopted declaring international conciliation as essentially a Christian task, to be undertaken in concert by the churches of all nations.

Many of the delegates had made their way to Constance under difficulties, including some alarming experiences and arrest in two cases, and it was decided to adjourn to London. Under a safe conduct from the Kaiser, who had conveyed by the assistant court preacher an expression of his interest in the Conference, and with the special protection of the Grand Duchess of Baden, the delegates passed through the military lines, leaving Flushing just an hour before the German warships menaced the channel. On reaching London, the English delegates found that their own land was already at war.

The meeting in London was not one for the consideration of resolutions, but for deep thought and earnest intercession. The spirit of the Conference was expressed by the report of the committee appointed by the Federal Council delegates, which was adopted by the entire American delegation, setting forth the sincere and profound reluctance with which the serious element in every nation was drawn into the conflict.

The American delegates have united in a report to the churches in this country which says:

> This war, so far from indicating the futility of our plans and endeavors, or the foolishness of Christian idealism, is demonstrating that the methods of brute force, and of inconsiderate egotism, are as unintelligent and inefficient as they are un-Christian. We are witnessing the reductio ad absurdum of un-Christian civilization; for peace is not to be secured by preparations for war (even if un-Christian men compel their brothers in self-defense, and for the sake of sacred treaties, to make ready for war). Not that it is in the interests of peace to belittle the spirit of patriotism, but to Christianize it. Like our laws and our culture, our education and commerce and industrialism, so too our very patriotism must be pervaded by the mind of Christ and be ready for the discipline of the cross—the sign and symbol, not merely of brotherly love, but of international love, over against the shortsightedness and selfishness of individuals and peoples. As we disperse to our homes and fatherland, that is the message we are bringing from this Conference; and it is first and foremost a call to international humiliation and prayer in the name and confidence of Christ. The time for men to prevent war is not when events are culminating, but far, far back at the springs of human conduct, individual, national and international. Let us see to it that henceforth "all our fresh springs are in God."

LIFE AS SEEN IN THE AFRICAN JUNGLES

BY JAMES R. MORRIS

SOME time ago I was seated on the porch of a house in West Africa reading my Bible. Hearing sounds which seemed like a cross between a moan and a chant, I stood up and looked from whence the voices came. Droning along in single file, with loads of piasava fiber on their backs, I beheld about sixty Kpwesi or Pessah men. They were bringing in their fiber to barter it for gum, tobacco, cloth and salt.

The thought of their heathen darkness and need brought to my heart a longing to tell them of the Light of the world, who could and would supply their every need. With a prayer for guidance, I hurried to the owner of the large factory, and asked him to provide me with an interpreter, as I wished to have a "God palaver" with a crowd of Pessah men, who by this time had reached his place and were seated beside their loads in the yard surrounding his factory.

Having procured the interpreter, I told him the white man wanted to talk to these Pessah men, and asked him to call them closer together. I commenced by saying:

"You be Pessah men, and live back in the bush?" They grunted, "Yes, daddy." Always it is "daddy."

A FAMILY GROUP OF THREE

"You come here to trade and barter your fiber for gin, cloth, tobacco and salt?"

"Yes, daddy," they reply.

I say to them: "Cloth be good. Salt be good. Gin, he be bad. Rum and gin bite you like poison snake and kill you. Tobacco be not good."

"No, no, daddy," they answer; "gin be good. He make you shiver all over, and make you 'trong. But no drink too much; then he be bad man fo' true-true."

"You see this Book? It be God's book. It tell man how to live right. It come down from the sky. It be stronger than rum or any 'medicine' or charm. It give you life and tell you how to live forever."

"Tell we 'bout dis book, daddy," they request.

"The big God in the sky had one Boy. His name be Jesus, that means one who can save you from all bad things. He came down to earth to heal people when fever catch 'em or any kind of sickness comes to us. And he has power to take all bad out of our hearts, and put good in its place. So that you never beat or sell your wife, nor make slave of your children or other people. He 'make your heart lie down' when trouble come, and put a song in your mouth, so you always be happy."

"How we gwine to git dis Book medicine, daddy?" they ask.

"It is like this," I answer. "God is everywhere. You can't see him with your eyes, nor feel him with your hands. But if you believe what this Book says about his Boy, Jesus, who died on a cross for you and the world, he will take the sins out of your heart, and put a gladness into it, and you will feel him in your heart. Then you will be kind to your wife and children. You will not make any more witch, nor drink rum, nor gamble for your cattle, slaves, children or wives. And when you die God will take you to his big town in the sky where you will live and be happy forever."

One wiry black man, whose teeth were filed like saw teeth, had been sitting twirling the little braid of hair over his ear, and listening intently to the conversation between the interpreter, the people and myself. Looking at me with wistful eagerness, he asked:

"Where God live, daddy? We no know him. Nobody cum to tell we 'bout him. Make you go cum to we town, and teach we Book?"

No doubt this man has eaten human flesh, but he was hungry for the Word of him who said: "This is my flesh which I will give for the life of the world." "Give ye them to eat."

They are wild and crude people, full of superstition and fears; but they are the "other sheep" whom Jesus must bring, and to whom we must go with the message of love and salvation. They are not the filthy degraded wretches so often pictured. Ignorant they are; but they are clean in body, and perhaps as morally clean as many people who live in America without Christ. Their towns and villages are cleaner and healthier than many of ours. No filth or garbage is permitted to remain in them. They know it would instantly decay and cause disease, so it is done away with at once.

When they arise in the morning, they immediately take a warm bath and anoint their bodies with palm oil. During the day, a bath or two is usually taken in a neighboring brook or river. Before "chop lift," or suppertime at night, another hot bath is taken, hence they are clean.

Most of them have very fine skins and splendid physiques. Many of the men are great hunters and expert with the bow and arrow, knife and spear. The arrows of these jungle hunters are frequently poisoned in order that when they wound an animal, they can track it, and sooner or later find it dead, bring it home, and divide it among their townspeople. They live mostly in a communal system. When they go to war their arrows are poisoned also.

These jungle people are not very particular concerning their food. One of our missionary ladies was down with an attack of fever some time ago. This was a source of sorrow to these poor, unlearned, yet sympathetic natives, who in their own way are really compassionate and want to help. One of these "bush mammies" tried to express her sorrow because the "white mammy missionary" was so ill. After a time she left the station with a bright idea in her head, and started for the jungle. A little later she returned with a large tropical leaf from one of the trees. Upon it were several big, crawling green worms, which she had caught and brought to the sick missionary. She thought they would be nice and tender for her to eat during her illness.

Equal suffrage has not yet penetrated Africa's jungles. A husband will send two of his wives out to plant and care for the cassada farm. Two more will be appointed to look after the rice farm, to plant, attend it, drive off the rice birds and animals, and, finally, to cut and harvest the crop. Two more will be delegated to the jungle, to chop and bring home firewood. Another will be commissioned to carry water for the family. Another will do the cooking. Still another will shine her husband's sword, light his pipe and bring it to him, while he sits in the kitchen, and talks any kind of "palaver" that his men friends care to quibble about. The husband works on the principle of "to every woman her work."

What these jungle ladies lack in clothing, they make up in hair adornment. Some styles are pleasing while others are very grotesque. Their hair combs are made of a very tough wood, and they need to be tough, for one of the feminine customs is to put gum all through their hair to keep it in place. A very strong comb is needed to get it apart, but the women contrive

Heroes

HATEFUL as war is, and utterly abhorrent to the Christian mind, we must yet recognize the fact that it brings to the surface as nothing else can, certain heroic qualities in man that the whole world admires. And the Great War has already been prolific of heroes. What is a hero? He is one who does his duty fearlessly, as he sees it, with all the energy, ability, power and enthusiasm at his command. At Liège, a German officer directing his men in the trenches fell shot in the head. At once the others came to him, eager to help. He waved his hand. "No, no," he said; "I have got my account—go forward—do your duty." And so died a hero. Prince Frederick of Lippe, leading his command, received a bullet in his breast. He knew it to be a mortal wound, but with his last ounce of strength, he sprang forward, grasped the regimental standard which was in danger of being taken, and shouting "Save the flag!" fell to rise no more. Many incidents of individual heroism like these are told of both sides, and they relieve the somber tragedy of war. Many undistinguished heroes went to their death at Namur, Charleroi and other battlefields in Belgium and along the border from Mons to Muelhausen, and at the great battle in Lorraine, where 300,000 fought on either side. The story is told of a number of students of Liège University, who had volunteered for military service. There was an examination to be held, but a great battle had already begun. It was at first proposed to abandon the examination; but with a unanimous voice, the students and faculty decided that it should go on. "The examination took place," relates the correspondent, "and then the candidates trooped from the hall to the battlefield, where many of them lay dead a few hours later."

We picture in imagination the great armies swaying back and forth in combat, amid the incessant roar of cannon, and we can be sure that wherever death reaps his terrible harvest on such battlefields, he gets many a heroic soul who deserved a better fate and who would have been well worth saving to the world.

There is another kind of heroism. Whitelaw Reid once wrote, in telling of our own Civil War in 1861, that these other heroes were "the great, brave, patient, nameless people"—the silent heroes, both men and women, who suffer probably worst of all and whose lives are overshadowed and ruined by the calamity of war.

May God help those silent ones who, although they do not go to the front in the Great War, bear the heavier burden of sorrow and suffering. In such a time of affliction all distinctions are forgotten; racial and religious differences fall away like a mask and we see only the sorrowing multitudes of the bereaved—feel only pity for the thousands of lonely widows and for the great army of little orphan children whose dear ones will return to them no more.

A Place for Men of Good Will

THE discussion arose the other day between two Christian workers as to whether or not an unconverted man should take a prominent part in church affairs. They agreed that in some cases it is right for such a man to help in church work, provided of course he make no definite profession of an experience he does not possess.

In almost every church are to be found men who really love the church, who like to associate with Christian people, who stand with the church in every good cause and wish to help it, but who through some difficulty in matters of faith, or some diffidence in spiritual things, or, it may even be, through some unwillingness to make a surrender of their lives to Christ, fail of attaining a definite Christian experience. The question is, should these men be denied the privilege of helping the church with their time and strength as well as with their money? The answer is clearly "no." Many churches provide that their trustees or corresponding officers who have charge of the church buildings, need not be members of the church, while insisting that those in charge of its spiritual affairs be in full connection.

Often such men, through their association with God's people and their ever-growing interest in the affairs of the kingdom, become true Christians. It is the duty of the believers in every church to encourage such souls, taking their aid in temporal matters and endeavoring to repay this with spiritual aid, leading them to the true riches of the soul.

But care must be taken not to encourage these men to hope that such outward tasks can ever take the place of spiritual life. When the Jews came to Jesus asking: "What shall we do that we might work the works of God?" he replied: "This is the work of God, that ye believe." They should be made to feel that they are putting off to a later time the step which should have been taken first. They should be urged to make the full surrender, to take the step of faith, and to find for themselves that God is willing to manifest himself to their souls. They should be made to see how much their power in helping the church and in doing good will be increased by receiving in their hearts the supernatural, abundant powers of God himself.

Nothing can ever justify hypocrisy. That is always loathsome. Pretenders to piety are an offense to God and man. But "men of good will" should be made to feel at home in God's house, while pastor and people strive together to win their faith and their hearts to the Saviour.

The Duration of the War

IT IS now a full month since the outbreak of the great war, and military experts have already begun discussing its probable duration. No one is surprised to find their opinions widely differing, due doubtless to the fact that in many essential characteristics, the struggle is without a parallel. Some of the professional tacticians venture the statement that the combatants will find themselves at the point of exhaustion within three months; others, more conservative, regard it as a campaign in which the policy of delay, on the part of the Allies, may prolong hostilities for many months. Conjectures of this sort, while interesting, have little real value. The most serious consideration is as to the ability of the respective nations to stand the tremendous drain upon their military and food resources. Even in England, with its colonial resources added, the strain must soon make itself felt. Germany, with its tremendous military machine and its overwhelming superiority in field strength and efficiency, has resources for such a campaign that seem well-nigh inexhaustible. Count Bernstorff, the German ambassador in Washington, has declared that the German food supply is practically limitless, and that the country is self-sustaining and needs no outside help. Perhaps the only other power of which this can be said is Russia, whose vast food area could supply her armies indefinitely.

But there is no certainty that the war will be prolonged. Already the momentum of Germany's advance has swept aside every obstacle. Although the Allies are credited with superiority in number this has been more than counterbalanced by the efficiency of the German machine. It has been a war of surprises, and there are doubtless more surprises in store. According to the admissions of the Allies, they hope to prolong the struggle in Belgium and France sufficiently to give the Russian armies time to reach Berlin. That is clearly their chief hope; but the Czar's troops have not yet reached the strong chain of German defenses. That part of Germany which has been invaded is the least important and the least defended.

In discussing the duration of the war, we must look the existing situation squarely in the face. Ostend, now held by the Germans, is but sixty-six miles from the English coast. Germany has not yet used her Zeppelins in force. Should she decide to do so, it might change the whole aspect of the situation. Meanwhile, three capitals are menaced—Paris by the German armies, Berlin more remotely by the Russian legions, and London by the dreaded aerial fleet. On which of these will the blow first fall?

Outwitting the Looters

A LOOTER has always been considered a sort of criminal outside the pale of ordinary crime. He is only one step lower than the "ghoul," who robs dead bodies. The man who will go through a house that is burning and, under pretext of saving goods, steal them; the man who will evade police lines and steal from the ruins of fire or flood—that man has been a creature to be classed with wild beasts.

President Wilson took prompt measures when he found that some individuals and concerns in America were taking advantage of the dreadful war in Europe to raise prices here on foodstuffs. Investigations have been conducted, recommendations made, prosecutions threatened. In New York plans are about complete for the opening of several municipal markets, at which prices can be held steady. George W. Perkins heads an investigating committee appointed by the mayor, and Mrs. Julia Heath has been put in charge of a bureau where housewives may bring complaints and receive suggestions. During the two weeks ending August 29 beef prices went down a little, owing to the fact that housewives began to boycott that commodity. But they need flour, and flour continues to go up. One flour expert predicted that it might reach ten dollars a barrel.

Suggestions have been made to the government that exportations of foodstuffs to the nations at war be prohibited in the hope of shortening the conflict, but not sufficient pressure could be brought to bear to ensure this move, though it would not only probably shorten the war, but would certainly help to keep prices normal here.

The whole business of cornering the necessaries of life is a sad commentary on human nature, and on civilization. The watchwords of the race still seem to be strife and spoil. But at least the war looters are being checked, and out of this agitation and experimentation may come a definite system for the control of food prices by the people, rather than a continued and abject subservience to the whim of organized "business."

Souvenirs from the Holy Land

ON ANOTHER page you will find the story of a recent pilgrimage to Palestine by the president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He went there as the representative of the readers of this journal, and with a very special object in view—to bring back a pleasant surprise to the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family Circle by putting at the disposal of every member, free of all charges, some valued souvenirs of the Holy Land. He succeeded beyond his expectations, and we feel assured that the announcement in this issue of the result of his efforts will be received with genuine appreciation. You may never go to Palestine in person, but these beautiful souvenirs will bring the old "land of promise" to your doors. Read the announcement, fill in your coupons and mail to us at once. Remember, the opportunity will not last longer than the present month.

Butter Tree of Tropics

MR. YERBY, the United States Consul at Sierra Leone, tells of a wonderful tropical tree called the shea, or butter tree. It furnishes the natives not only with nuts, which they highly prize, but with butter, which may become an article of commerce of importance, since it is already exported to Europe, where it is used in making artificial butter. This tree produces a nut covered with a soft pulp, which is in turn covered with a smooth skin, easily removable when the nut ripens. This pulp is sweet and wholesome. About sixty per cent. of the nut is butter, which is edible. The tree begins to bear when it is fifteen years old, and reaches its full capacity in twenty-five years. Barring jungle fires a butter plantation is a long time and profitable investment. Chocolate manufacturers could easily absorb the product. Candles and soap can also be made of it. Trees that can produce butter, soap and candles are worth cultivating. The value of trees as food producers is thus described:

When thou shalt besiege a city a long time, in making war against it to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof by forcing an ax against them; for thou mayest eat of them, and thou shalt not cut them down (for the tree of the field is man's life) to employ them in the siege. (Deut. 20: 19.)

"I Will" Meditations

A WIDELY circulated secular newspaper prints on its editorial page five powerful "I will" statements to meditate upon during the ensuing week. First, I will know that God is my only source of strength. Second, I will thank God daily for the prosperity constantly provided for me. Third, I will praise God that I recognize that I am one with him in the riches of his kingdom. Fourth, I will glorify God in the beauty of wholeness in my body, soul and spirit, and my affairs. Fifth, I will be that which I will to be. The intellect and sensibilities are all important in the secular and spiritual realm, but the dominating faculty of the mind is the will. The human will lost in the divine will is the nearest to omnipotence of anything this side of the white throne. Oneness with Christ insures harmony between the human and divine will. Paul thus describes this relationship:

I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. (Gal. 2: 20.)

Veteran Locomotive Engineer Retires

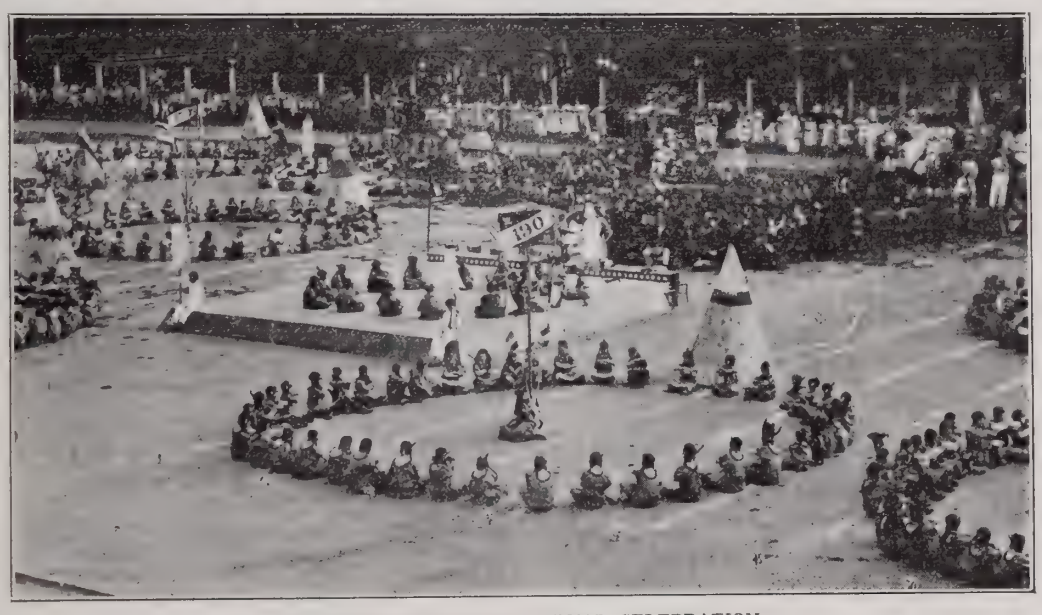
WHEN the Lake Shore Limited of the New York Central took on its electric engine at Harmon the other day, Dennis J. Cassin, who had brought her down from Albany, retired after more than fifty-two years of service. He started as a wiper with the Hudson River Railroad in 1861, before the line was amalgamated with the New York Central, and became an engineer in 1867. His record of forty-seven years as engineer is among the longest in the history of American railroading. Friends in his old home town as well as at Albany and Harmon combined the other day to make his last run a jubilee occasion. C. Christy, superintendent of the Hudson River Division, was in the cab with him. Friends at Albany hung a big wreath over the headlight before the train started, and when the Lake Shore Limited passed the railroad shops in Rensselaer, whistles were blowing and flags waving, and a large percentage of the force had turned out to give Mr. Cassin a salute. When he left the train at Harmon, the employees of the Hudson River Division shops there presented him with a huge basket of roses. Such men are as necessary to the success of the railroads as the rich men who furnish money. There could be no railroads and no transportation without the rugged, splendid men of the type of Dennis Cassin, who did his work with intelligence, fidelity and heroism, taking his life in his hand every day for the benefit of the public. He could say at the close of the more than half century of practical service, what Paul said at the close of his heroic career in the spiritual realm:

I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. (II Tim. 4: 7.)

Missions Friendly to Hospitals

A WRITER in a cosmopolitan daily devotes almost a column to asking the people of the United States not to contribute a single cent of missionary money until every community in the United States shall have provided a well-equipped hospital where needy patients may be treated without any charge whatever. It is hard to understand why economy in behalf of missions should have been demanded while millions and even billions of dollars are wasted on habits that harm, and luxuries that could be dispensed with, sums which would furnish ten times the number of hospitals that could be used. It should not be forgotten that missions carry cure for the body as well as for the soul. Nearly all denominations have medical missionaries, and many of them have well-equipped hospitals under their care in the various heathen nations of the earth. Our American civilization, with the best system of charity on earth, would have been an impossibility, had it not been for Paul the great missionary who came to the soil of Europe, and his spiritual successors who came to our own land. It is an ungracious and unjust thing to charge that gifts to the missionary cause in any way hinder the foundation or support of our hospitals or other benevolent institutions. Christianity has ever followed the example of its Founder who devoted himself to the cure of the body as well as the soul, which cure is thus recorded:

And great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all. (Matt. 12: 15.)



CHILDREN IN TERCENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

THE three hundredth anniversary of the regularly Chartered Commerce of what is now the State of New York, under the auspices of the States General of the United Netherlands in 1614, is being observed in New York City. A series of interesting public celebrations have been and are to be held, some of them utilizing the school children in large numbers. Recently several thousand children from the public schools gathered in one of the city's parks and entertained a multitude with charming figures, marches, tableaux, folk dances and other exercises, the children being dressed mostly in Indian garb and representing Indian life in many of their tableaux, etc. This celebration is unique and will continue into the autumn. There is no celebration of any kind that could be complete without the introduction of children into it somewhere, as the boys and the girls are the joy of the home, the hope of the state and the church. They are to our national life what the springtime is to the year. The outdoor sport of childhood is thus referred to in the sacred Scriptures: "And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." (Zech. 8: 5.)

Annual Embezzlement Forty Millions

ACCORDING to the statement of the President of the National Surety Company, forty millions of dollars each year are embezzled in one way or another. Eighty per cent. of this amount is taken by those who satisfy their conscience with the promise that the amount taken will be returned, and that at once, and that nobody will know of the wrong-doing. Four-fifths of the cashiers, bookkeepers and other trusted financial employees in the first stages of embezzlement, make themselves believe that they will pay back their unauthorized borrowings. Almost all criminals down to the very worst, present some excuse or apology for their wrong-doing. There is only one thing to do and that is to be scrupulously honest—to refuse to lay a finger upon a penny that belongs to some one else. This rule applies to those who have millions of trust funds, as much to those who are charged with the responsibility of a few hundred dollars or dimes. The apostle makes this reference to strict integrity:

For we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly. (Heb. 13: 18.)

Prayer for Peace

BISHOP GREER of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York sent to the pastors for use in their churches the following prayer: "O God, who hast made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, and who in thy Holy Word hast taught us that one is our Father, even God, and that all we are brethren; we pray thee in this dark hour of international strife that thou wilt open the eyes of the people, and those who in thy name are entrusted with the authority of governance, to see and understand their right and true relation to thee, and through thee to one another. Teach them by thy Spirit that hatred and violence are not strength but weakness; that the true safeguarding of a nation is not found in weapons of war, but in those eternal principles which make for righteousness and truth and brotherhood and peace. Give to those who shall suffer in the war which is raging now the consolations of thy grace. Heal the sick; comfort the wounded; minister to the dying, and bind up the broken heart. Bring, we pray thee, to a speedy end this international strife; and hasten the time when peace shall flourish out of the earth, and all shall dwell together in unity and love, and war shall be no more. We ask it in the name of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen." Since the European war began, the hearts of the various churches of the civilized world have gone out in prayer that God may speedily substitute for the menacing armaments of the world the blessed industries of peace, that this prophecy of the psalmist may be fulfilled:

He maketh war to cease unto the end of the earth. (Ps. 46: 9.)

Income Tax Report

COL. W. H. OSBORN, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, has just made his preliminary annual report. It shows that the total collections under the Income Tax law for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, amounted to $71,381,274.69, distributed as follows: Corporation excise tax, $10,671,077.22; corporation income tax, $32,456,662.67; individual income tax, $28,253,534.80. Individual income tax was computed upon five-sixths of net incomes accruing for the calendar year 1913. One-third of the burden of the income tax fell on the State of New York. Pennsylvania ranked second with collections of $9,272,400.66. Third in relative rank was Illinois with collections of $6,369,820.79. The method of supporting the government by taxation is as old as governments. The Romans laid tribute on Palestine:

And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city. (Luke 2: 3.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

Boston Saving its Citizens

LOSS of life and loss of limbs by street accidents in Boston have been greatly reduced by the Safety First movement, the committee having the campaign in charge reporting that only a third as many fatalities occurred this July as last, and about three-fourths as many lesser accidents. In other years many little children have been killed or badly hurt, but this summer not one child under twelve years was seriously injured in a street car accident during July, the month of the campaign, according to the report.

Gospel Workers Stir Baltimore

OUTDOOR preaching has won its way in Baltimore this summer, according to the press of that city, over 700 meetings having reached an estimated 300,000 people, more than 2,000 of whom signed cards pledging a better life and identification with some Christian church. The general secretary of the Maryland Tract Society, Rev. J. Monroe Stick, is in charge of the work. A Gospel wagon is used that can be transformed into a platform holding some twenty-five persons, and is drawn about the city by four horses.

Insatiable Shorthand Writers

THE uppermost stratum of shorthand writers—professional reporters of court, legislative and convention proceedings—in their annual convention at Atlantic City in August laid plans to enforce a uniform scale of rates for such work, to be effective throughout the country—the rates to be sufficient—and condemned a congressional bill authorizing the attorney general to fix the salaries of United States court stenographers. The specialized service performed by this class of stenographers plays an important part in litigation, as well as in other departments of civic life. The compensation received by some is said to be in excess of that of the average attorney. Shorthand reporters are trained in the law, in medicine, and in other subjects in which they specialize, and their national association is in effect a labor union of professional men.

Peace Parade Idea Spreads

THE plan of the women of New York to march through its principal avenue garbed in black, minus music and banner, excepting drums and fifes, as a protest against the war in Europe received the approval of President Wilson, whose views were sought because of his public appeal for personal neutrality throughout the country, and between five and ten thousand women were expected to be in line August 29, many of them from nearby States. The plan has found favor in other large cities, and will probably be put into execution in Chicago at an early date, the ministers of that city having inaugurated a huge peace meeting to be held soon on the Lake Front, a peace parade being one feature of the movement.

Big Irrigation Suit Nearly Ready

THE suit of Wyoming to prevent Colorado's diverting the Laramie River for irrigation purposes will soon be submitted to the United States Supreme Court in the form of testimony gathered in hearings extending over two years and filling 15,000 pages in nine books, an abstract of which will comprise 2,000 printed pages. State rights in streams that traverse two or more States, and consequently vast irrigation interests, are said to depend upon the final decision in this celebrated case. The Laramie rises in Colorado and runs partly through Wyoming, and the latter State claims that its citizens have been illegally deprived of water benefits by the diverting of the river by Colorado citizens. The case is regarded as the most important of its kind.

Chicago to Be a Seaport

IF PRESS reports are substantiated, a fleet of steamships will ere long be making regular trips between Chicago and New Orleans picking up other inland ports en route. The object is to facilitate the exchange of Middle West products for those of Central and South America. A system of banking service is included in the plan, which is being pushed by several Chicagoans.

New Jersey Faces Strike War

LABOR troubles at the Roebling Wire Works, the Mercer Automobile and other plants near Trenton became so serious toward the close of August that the different works were closed and the governor was appealed to for protection. Governor Fielder announced, August 25, that the militia would be sent to preserve order if conditions did not improve.

A Paragraph About Colorado

MODESTLY hiding itself in an out-of-the-way column of the press of August 26 appeared the statement that the twenty-two militia officers and men under court martial trial for murder, manslaughter, arson and larceny in connection with the Ludlow battle in the Colorado mines April 20, were acquitted; though one officer was convicted of justifiably striking a miner with a rifle. The findings of the court were approved by Governor E. H. Ammons.

From Farm to Table via Post Office

TEN cities have been testing the usefulness of the parcel post as a saving medium between producers of foodstuffs and consumers thereof: Washington, St. Louis, Boston, Baltimore, Atlanta, Birmingham, San Francisco, Rock Island, Lynn and La Crosse. Their experiences differ, but the cumulative evidence is that the service is welcomed by both the farmer and the city dweller. The department finds that lack of information retards the growth of the service, and urges producers to acquaint themselves with the conditions under which they can deliver their goods right at the consumer's door. The post office records show the following articles among the long list of perishable things mailed: butter, fish, hams, home-made cake, oysters, molasses, pickles, lard. The service is still in the experimental stage, and numerous improvements, devices and inventions are constantly being considered by the Post Office Department.

Hard Conditions for Legislators

FAILURE to do their work will lose congressmen their per diem of $20.54 for each day's absence, the sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives having sent telegrams to that effect on August 25 to 180 members whose prolonged absence has hampered legislation. The resolution revoking all leave of absence and authorizing the call was passed by a vote of 213 to 27, all cast by congressmen on duty. Political exigencies explain most of the absences, fall campaigns now being under way. A plea was made on behalf of members whose political fortunes might be endangered, but the strange idea that the country's business is paramount to all else won the day.

The America's Cup to Remain Here

THE annual yacht races of the Atlantic Yacht Club and others are being held off Sea Gate, N. J., and in other waters as scheduled, but the event that would have drawn the attention of two continents, namely the third effort of Sir Thomas Lipton to lift the America's cup, has been called off because of the war. The three American candidates for the honor of defending the historic prize have competed among themselves in vain, for the newest Shamrock perforce has declined the combat. It was expected that the race would be close.

LUTHERAN SILVER JUBILEE CELEBRATION

THE Evangelical Synodical Conference of North America celebrated its silver jubilee when it met at Milwaukee, Wis., August 12-17, in the Bethlehem Evangelical Lutheran Church, of which the Rev. O. Kaiser is pastor.

This conference, organized in 1877, is composed of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, the Wisconsin Synod, the Minnesota Synod, the Michigan Synod, the Nebraska Synod, and the Slovak Synod.

The ninety-one accredited delegates present, together with two from the Evangelical Lutheran Norwegian Synod affiliated with the Synodical Conference, represent almost four thousand congregations with a communicant membership of about one million.

At the opening session, the Rev. C. Gausewitz, president of the Conference and pastor of Grace Lutheran Church, Milwaukee, delivered the sermon on John 6: 15, pointing out how the people of today try to force Christ to be a king of this world, and desire to make him stand sponsor for culture, morality, social betterment, philosophy, and for almost every form of religion invented by man. The speaker showed that Christ departs when such worldly crowns are offered to him, as he did during his sojourn on earth. His word still stands, "My kingdom is not of this world." His is a kingdom of the truth with spiritual gifts which make for the temporal and eternal welfare of the soul. And what Christ expects of his church is to preach the Gospel.

At the first business session the election of officers took place with the following result: President, Rev. C. Gausewitz, Milwaukee, Wis.; vice-president, Rev. H. Speckhardt, Saginaw, Mich.; secretary, Professor J. Meyer, New Ulm, Minn.; treasurer, Mr. H. A. Christiansen, Detroit, Mich. Other officers chosen were: Chaplain, Rev. F. Brand, Springfield, Ill.; German reporter, Rev. H. Ebert, Milwaukee; German reporter for church papers, Professor Otto Hoenecke, Saginaw, Mich.; English reporter, the Rev. W. M. Czamanske, Sheboygan, Wis.

"The New Testament Titles of Christians" was the subject of a doctrinal paper read by the Rev. William Dallmann, pastor of Mount Olive English Lutheran Church, Milwaukee. This interesting paper will be printed in full in the proceedings to be issued by the Concordia Publishing House, St. Louis, Mo.

A committee was appointed to confer with a committee from the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Synod in regard to differences in doctrines that have arisen. The committee, consisting of Professor W. H. T. Dau, St. Louis, Mo.; Dr. F. Pieper, St. Louis, Mo.; Professor Theodore Schlueter, Watertown, Wis., with the following alternates: Professor J. Meyer, New Ulm, Minn.; Rev. C. Gausewitz, Milwaukee, Wis.; Dr. C. A. Abbetmeyer, St. Paul, Minn., and Rev. William Moll, Fort Wayne, Ind., was instructed to use every opportunity offered by the Norwegian Synod for the settlement of differences, and to make every attempt to reach the goal set at a former session of the Synodical Conference, in order that an agreement may be consummated. The committee was authorized to make known the result of its labors, if it deems such a course expedient.

The different Synods of which the Synodical Conference is composed conjointly prosecute the work of negro missions. This work is being carried on in ten different States, and in Washington, D. C., having at present a communicant membership of 2,700, under the care of fifty-four laborers, the majority of whom are colored. In the last year, eighteen new mission stations were opened. Rev. N. J. Bakke, St. Louis, Mo., the field secretary, gave a graphic description of the work as now constituted. He stated that the mission stations were enjoying a healthy growth, that the negroes in church and school contributed largely toward maintaining this mission work, last year giving $5,500. In the last thirty years, they have given $60,000.

The Synodical Conference is making every effort to raise the material, social and religious standard of these benighted freedmen of the South. Largely through parochial schools, into which 2,200 children have been gathered, the fear of God and the virtue of chastity is being instilled in the minds and hearts of the young. The good seed is carried by them into the homes, where it has borne good fruit. The honesty and industry of the negro families trained in our churches and schools are recognized even by the white men of the South.

Our country has a negro population of about ten millions. Only one-third of these people are nominal church members. Almost half of the negro children born today are born out of wedlock. The black slave traffic is even more appalling than the white slave traffic.

The Synodical Conference has two colleges, or training schools, for the negro in the South, one at New Orleans and one at Greensboro, N. C. Luther College at New Orleans had two professors and forty-one scholars during the past year. Immanuel Lutheran College in Greensboro, N. C., has six professors and eighty-eight students. Since 1903, this latter institution has turned out ten colored pastors and fourteen colored teachers, who are now working among their own people.

Rev. N. J. Bakke, field secretary, traveled 15,000 miles during the past two years, visiting all the mission stations and colleges, delivering sermons and addresses, besides his literary work for the Lutheran Pioneer and Die Missionstaube, the official organs of the Synodical Conference, issued in the interest of negro mission work.

The following resolutions were adopted to further the cause of this mission:

Ten thousand dollars were voted for ten new chapels at ten different stations, some of these are to be portable chapels. Three thousand dollars were set aside for a ladies' dormitory at Immanuel Lutheran College, and $300 for necessary repairs. It was resolved that a dwelling-place for Rev. John McDavid be erected for $800.

In place of Rev. W. Hallerberg, of St. Louis, Mo., resigned, the Rev. W. F. Schulze was elected as a member of the colored mission board.

A vote of thanks for its unparalleled hospitality was extended to Bethlehem Lutheran Church in whose midst the Conference held its sessions.

Professor G. Metzger of St. Louis, Mo., will present a doctrinal paper at the next session of Synodical Conference to be held at Toledo, Ohio, in 1916.

GENERAL NOTES OF CURRENT INTEREST

—ONE OF THE CHARMS of this week's cover picture is its faithful reproduction of natural colors. This delightful effect is obtained by the wonderful lumière process, the three-color photography described in a previous issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The subject was chosen for this number in order to give our readers another beautiful example of this modern art, and also because of the refreshment to tired hearts that comes from such untroubled scenes. Roses still bloom somewhere—and always will; life is still calm and trustful somewhere—and always will be. War is in the world, but peace is here too, and will prevail.

—THE WOMAN'S BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., has just completed a splendid boarding school for Mexican girls at Los Angeles, Calif., which cost $30,000, the fund created by enthusiastic women of California. The school opened with seventy-five girls.

—MISS EDITH FREDERICKS of the New York Branch of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church is planning an exhibit on "Child Life and Motherhood All Over the World." It will represent a wonderful exhibit of pictures of mothers and children from every land.

—"BIBLE TEAS" ARE THE latest popular idea in missionary work in China, according to a letter just received from Miss Wethy B. Honsinger, American principal of the Baldwin (Methodist) School for Girls at Nanchang. She writes: "Since America has gone mad over 'tango teas' we intend to create as much madness over 'Bible teas' in Nanchang. We have started them on Friday afternoons in our home. The ladies began coming at three o'clock for a four o'clock tea; the wives of four former native magistrates were among the number; the wives of prominent members of the gentry. But such questions as these women asked! It was worth months of labor to see the interest they took in the Bible. We gave to each a copy of the Gospel of Matthew, and most of the guests took it home to prepare for the next tea."

—ACCORDING TO THE BERLIN correspondent of the London Christian World, the creation of a cardinal is an expensive function for the candidate, who must spend a small fortune in fees and tips. Several of the eleven cardinals lately created were compelled to borrow money to meet this draft on their resources. There are, first, legal disbursements of about $10,000, and then a long list of unofficial items to be met. The new cardinal's "court" costume averages $4,000. Then he has to pay gratuities to "the toll keeper of the Angelus bridge," the "custodian of the key of Borgo," the servants of the Pope cardinal-nephew, the servants of the papal secretary of state, $1,200 to the "Spiritual Privy Chamberlain," and sums varying from $2.50 to $30 each to trumpeters, "apostolic messengers," runners, coachmen, valets, doorkeepers, etc. Thus the "red hat," with its appurtenances, makes of many a cardinal a poorer and wiser cleric, who has paid heavily for his new dignity.

—THE PROPOSED NEW INTERNATIONAL HOSPITAL in Japan, so long a topic of discussion, has now become a fact, and plans are well under way to establish it in Tokyo, Japan, as a development of the present St. Luke's Hospital. This is the result of the active interest of Count Okuma, the premier of Japan, and the hearty co-operation of Baron Goto, Baron Sakatani (mayor of Tokyo), Dr. Nitobe, Mr. Sakai and others. As the result of a luncheon given on July 1 by the premier at his official residence, to which forty of the most prominent men in government and other circles in Tokyo were invited, a council was formed of all the members present to stand sponsors in Japan for the undertaking. Count Okuma accepted the presidency of the council, selecting Barons Goto, Sakatani and Shibusawa as vice-presidents. An executive committee was then appointed, and the council decided upon securing a suitable site for the new hospital. Two hundred thousand dollars will be raised with which to purchase the site. Among the many representative men present, besides those already mentioned, were: Mr. Ozaki, minister of justice; Baron Kondo, Dr. Ikki, minister of education; Mr. Shimooka, vice-minister of home affairs; Baron Mitsui, Mr. Nakano, president of the chamber of commerce; Count Mishima, and Professor Aoyama, dean of the medical faculty of the University of Tokyo. Count Okuma in presenting the plan said: "The establishment of this hospital would directly assist, in a practical way, international friendship and amity, and would aid the advancement of medical science and learning both in the Occident and the Orient." Among the letters to Count Okuma, expressing appreciation of the movement and hearty accord, was one from the American ambassador, Mr. Guthrie, and one from Sir Conyngham Greene, the British ambassador. The cost of the entire project will be $250,000.

Emperor William's Voice

A READER of this journal, Miss F. Wetmore, Northampton, Mass., sends this item which will be read with special interest at this time, when the subject of it is foremost in the minds of two continents. It is the transcript of a phonographic record of Emperor William's voice, the words having been spoken eight years ago. The writer of the letter says: "So much is said against him now that I like to recall the beautiful words he spoke a few years ago. This is the only record of the emperor's voice, I believe, that is known to exist at the present time. The record reads as follows:

"Be brave in adversity. Do not strive for what is unattainable or worthless: be content with each day as it comes; look at the good side of everything; take pleasure in nature, and accept your fellow men as you find them. For a thousand bitter hours comfort yourself with a single happy one; in effort and deed always do your best, regardless of reward. He who can do this will be fortunate, free, and independent; the days of his life will always be happy ones. He who is distrustful does wrong to others and injures himself. It is our duty to consider every person good as long as he does not prove the contrary. The world is so large and we human beings so small that everything cannot center in us alone. Even when something injures us or something hurts us who can know but that it is necessary for the benefit of the whole creation?

"Everything in the world whether good or otherwise, is the work of the great, wise will of the Almighty and all-knowing Creator, though we, petty creatures, may not be able to understand it.

"Everything in the world is exactly as it must be; and whatever it may be, the good is always the will of the Creator."

BEFORE THE JUDGE*

"Inasmuch"

By Arthur H. Howland

THE world is familiar with many kinds of judgments. Men are judged by the amount of money they have, and are taken in or kept out of various circles accordingly. People are judged by what they know or what they can do, and given or deprived of certain opportunities. People are judged by their ancestry, their manners, their keeping or breaking of laws, and a thousand other tests.

Now when we come to the last great scene, when the whole story of the human race reaches its conclusion and the final judgment of all is rendered, one would naturally expect that the test would be on very great and palpably important matters. Yet the things upon which those final judgments are to be passed, as stated by the Judge himself, sound very trivial—a cup of cold water; a meal to some one who is hungry; a welcome for a stranger; a garment for an outcast; a visit to a prisoner. Things like these to determine the final fate of the sons of men? Let us see.

Christ was not given to talking of trivialities. He often mentioned little things, but it was always with a big purpose. So here. What lies under and back of these tests of life's little kindnesses?

Just this. Christ, the world's great Leader, is organizing a new race of people. A race of people who love one another, who help one another, who really care for one another. The present order of things is extremely unsatisfactory to him. He does not like to have people striving with one another, competing with one another, oppressing, hurting, disliking, distrusting, destroying one another. The crowd of people he is getting together live on an altogether different plan. They love and help one another.

What will be the test, then, when Christ's crowd is all gotten together and begins in earnest the work which is to last through eternity? The test will be of course: "Have you a loving heart?" The password into that circle is "Love." If you can not speak it from the heart, if your life does not show it, there is no place for you in Christ's new company.

There is, after all, a deeper test than this test of kindness to others. The real test is how we feel toward the Judge himself. The actual bond that holds his followers together is not that they love one another but that they love him. Here is the whole mystical, magical plan of God in a nutshell. God is love. He wants his great family to love him. Love of him is the very essence of eternal life. So he came in the flesh; made a few warm friends; tested especially Simon Peter's love by his thrice-uttered question: "Lovest thou me?" went away again, leaving the information that the only way his followers could demonstrate and cultivate their love for him was by loving other people. He said, in effect: "I am going away. You cannot see me or serve me any more. But you can see me in others who need your help. They represent me. In a sense they are myself. Help them. Live for them. If you would like to make me glad; if you would like to think of giving me water when thirsty, or food when hungry, or comfort when lonely, do these things for them, and it will have been done for me. It will give me precisely the same satisfaction and gladness as though it had been done to me in the flesh. 'Lovest thou me? Feed my sheep.'"

Can we picture the grief of Jesus as he looks down on the world to-day? The men of Europe, representing nations that are called Christian, killing and maiming one another like wild beasts; children left homeless and fatherless; wives left desolate. In other lands, greed, and injustice, and oppression; laborers deprived of their earnings; children and women forced to deadly toil; young women thrust out into lives of sinful shame; the church rich and regal while his little ones sweat and starve and suffer and die.

Inasmuch! God spare us! God help us to understand! God help us to get ready for his judgment day!

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

The Old Testament lays stress on sins of commission, the New on those of omission. Those on the left of the Shepherd-King—"the goats"—go away into punishment, not because they did wrong, but because they didn't do right, merciful things towards those who needed help. See how the Lord identifies himself with the sorrows, the pain, and the sin of our world. It is told of St. Francis that on one occasion he encountered a leper, who presented a very loathsome spectacle. Reining up his horse, he dismounted, and for pity's sake soothed his sores and gave him alms. When riding away, he happened to turn back, and saw the Christ standing there. Yes, our Lord still walks our world, and assumes many disguises, in order to test the quality of our faith and love. Happy are we, if we have eyes quick enough to detect him, and minister with a pure love! We may forget such deeds, and be startled when he shall one day recall them; but they are recorded in the Book of Remembrance, which is being written before him.

The Infinite Balances

By Amos R. Wells

IN CHRIST'S picture of the judgment day, all nations are set before him, for approval or condemnation. But he does not judge them as nations; he judges them as individuals. Let those who plunge nations into war and bring uncounted sorrows upon their people—hunger, thirst, homelessness, nakedness, disease, death—remember this: that each is to be judged as a man, and that his judgment will not be merged in a national judgment. As I write, what may become the most terrible war of all history is beginning in Europe. From the divine viewpoint it is not a question of whether Austria is wrong, or Servia, or Germany, or Russia, but a question as to the uprightness or wickedness of one man at a time—emperor or minister or general or legislator or what not. If this truth could be brought home to men in all its eternal import, there would be no more war in Europe, or anywhere else.

In every mint there is a wonderfully delicate, accurate, and swift machine for judging coins. The newly minted pieces, whether dollars or dimes, are poured into a hopper and fall down upon the scales. More quickly than the eye can follow, the judgment is made. The defective, underweight coins are thrust to one side, and the good coins are pushed out on the other side. The latter go forth to a career of usefulness, the former go to the melting-pot.

Such a judgment, but far more marvelous, is that of the mind of Christ. He has to judge the innermost thoughts and feelings, as well as the words and deeds known to all men. He has to perceive possibilities as well as actualities, ideals and aspirations as well as failures and sins. And he knows it all, knows it far better than even the soul he judges knows it, and can interpret a man to himself. "Thank God that God shall judge my soul, not man!" sings Anna Aldrich in her poem, "The Eternal Justice."

"God is love"—that is the working principle of the judgment day. Put yourself in harmony with God's love, and you need not fear that day.

To compare great things with small, St. Augustine could not endure the presence at his table of any slanderer, or harsh-tongued, malicious person. He had warnings written on his table urging all such persons to leave the room. Neither will God admit any unloving soul to the marriage feast of his Son.

A little German girl was sitting on a stand watching a great army review. She saw a feeble old woman trying hard to get where she could see. "I am strong and can stand," said the child, and changed places with the old woman. While the girl was on her tiptoes, trying to see, a courtier of the emperor, splendidly dressed, summoned her to the royal box. When she stood timidly at last before her august sovereigns the empress said, "Come, my daughter, and sit with me. I saw you give up your seat to that old woman, and now you must remain by my side." This beautiful happening is an exact parallel to Christ's picture of the judgment day.

Most encouraging is our Lord's statement that those whom he will honor in the judgment will not realize that they have done anything worthy of honor. There is comfort here for many who think their lives amount to nothing. It is said that all the fuchsias in England sprang from a single plant which was brought to that country by a sailor boy from a foreign land as a present for his mother. She put it in her cottage window, where it attracted the attention of many. Now that was a lovely deed which glorified the sailor's entire life and made it well worth while; and he never knew it. He will be one of the happily surprised on the judgment day.

But this bright picture has a dark reverse; and Christ places it last, as the one he would have linger solemnly in our memory. As surely as there is eternal life, he warns us of eternal punishment. A palace in Venice shows a long line of portraits of the Doges; but one space is empty, and over it a black curtain is drawn. That was the space occupied by the face of Marino Falieri, the traitor.

Ah, there will be no vacant spaces around the festival board of heaven, no chairs draped in black, no memorials of dead souls. But there will be dead souls, cast out for evermore.

Quarterly Review Plans

Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts has found in his travels all over the land that it is the general feeling that twelve Sunday school lessons can not be effectively reviewed in one day.

It was suggested in the June review that the best use of review day was to make it for the beginners and the primary grade a day of nature studies, reviewing God's work in nature for the season, whether in flowers or snow: that for the juniors from eight to twelve the best use was to make it "Decision Day," a harvesting day for the evangelistic teaching of the quarter, and "Vocation Day" for the 'teen age, between twelve and twenty, when serious attention should be given to the question of what occupation ought to be chosen for life. For the adult classes the suggestion was that instead of trying to review twelve Bible lessons there should be a Christian citizenship review, recalling the work of God in our own time in social progress.

Dr. and Mrs. Crafts will prepare a Christian citizenship review for the last Sunday in September, and the matter is now brought to the attention of pastors, superintendents, and teachers in the hope that they will all begin to clip their newspapers with reference to classifying the news of the quarter. Let the temperance news, good or bad, be put into one envelope, that on Sunday observance into another, and let there be envelopes on purity and gambling, and also on pence, law enforcement, and similar subjects of moral and social reform. It is especially desirable that in adult classes committees of two or three should now be appointed to gather facts on each of these subjects, these committees to be allowed five minutes or less each in which to make their reports in succession. This will give a fresh chapter from the Newest Testament of the grace of God.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

—Why not [illegible] for a supper [illegible] to be held on Rally Day? C. N.

A Rally Day should be planned for several months in advance if it is to attain the best results. The following plans have been adopted by the Bushwick Avenue M. E. Sunday school in Brooklyn, N. Y., and will be found helpful in many other schools.

Each teacher receives a letter from the superintendent, urging her to make Rally Day a success. This should be followed by personal visits and a card for the record. The Annual Rally Committee of two is selected by consultation with the superintendent, whose duties have been stated and the duties.

The committee decides [illegible] Rally Day [illegible] A special program for the [illegible] day at the school's [illegible] If [illegible] success [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] suggestions [illegible] to [illegible]

[illegible] For instance, "Go forward" Ex. 14. 15. [illegible] a new organ in use [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Another year we [illegible] and Borders" was the theme. At the coming Rally Day of Bushwick Avenue M. E. Sunday school in Brooklyn, we will have four posts to aim for: "Every Scholar a Christian," "Every Christian a Worker," "Every Inch Paid," "Every Land for Christ." And for each of these goals we shall have a pennant. Our plan will be a "Bushwick Squadron," every department a ship on that squadron, and actual steering to age of scholars: Happy Hearts, Welcome Star, Sweet, Reliable, Home Guard. The superintendent will be the commodore and the department superintendent the captain. [illegible] will be constructed and the records posted by the boys. Recruits will be called for. Scripture texts bearing on the two central songs of the rally song, and appropriate recitations given. The decks will be "cleared for action" for the conquest of evil, the saloon, gambling, Sabbath-breaking, selfishness, etc. "Coal in the bunkers" will be the Rally Day offering. Danger signals will be unwrapped, using Scripture words.

Of course we shall try for a 100 per cent. attendance, and we rather think when the squadron is assembled there will be a lot of folks there.

Advertise. Don't fail to spend a little money if needed on advertising the plans in the local papers, in large posters on the church, or along the highways and in store windows. The money will come back in an increased collection.

Invitations. Send an attractive invitation to each scholar. For the "Squadron" idea we shall use a ship, or group of ships, to catch the attention, with a call to "mobilize." One year we had a Rally Council Fire, each member to bring a "fagot" for the fire in the form of a pledge for definite service for the school and Christ. Other plans are the use of the telegram, the train and station method, homecoming day, etc.

On the morning of Rally Day it is a good plan to have officers and teachers assemble in a body in the church service, and after a special sermon by the pastor on a Sunday school theme, the officers and teachers should come to the front and dedicate themselves to the work of the year, the pastor making the dedicatory prayer.

The superintendent should send to each worker a letter, straight from his heart, several weeks in advance of Rally Day, urging visitation of the scholars, the consecration of all to the winning of souls, and noting the events planned for the school work for the approaching fall months.

WHEN men at their work call out Bible questions to each other, it is safe to assume that there has been some rather stimulating system of Bible teaching at work somewhere. In Kansas there is a Bible class, the women of which are such devoted students their men folks actually get the habit to just that extent. In fact, CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are already familiar with that class: it is Mrs. Menninger's, in Topeka. The ninth graduating exercises were held on May 19. Now, Bible classes that move their members along to the graduating point are live classes. They deserve more than passing notice. And to the notice given this class in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in past years has been attributed much of the extension of Mrs. Menninger's influence among teachers of all denominations. The famous class is in the First Presbyterian Church in Topeka.

In the class on May 19 were 250 students, fifty of whom were high school girls; the Sunday class, two hundred, were women comprising the Tuesday morning and afternoon classes. Twenty, at Mrs. Menninger's request, volunteered to go to the platform and compete in a Bible-question contest in order to illustrate to the large audience the character of the work done in class. The contest was genuine. The questions went three times around before any one missed. They were based on the lessons for the preceding nine months. It almost looked as if there might be twenty winners, but some failed. By the time only three contestants were left standing the excitement was intense. Think of getting excited over a contest in Bible questions! When did your town pack a church to witness such an unworldly sight?

The motto of the class, which is a perpetual organization, is "Loving and serving, loving and serving." The primary duty is to engage in a word-for-word study of the Bible for four years. The secondary and subsequent duties comprise many kinds of Christian service. The class supports an evangelist in Korea, for example. It has students in China. Eleven States are represented in the present enrolment of student members.

The work is done systematically, and some time is given each day to Bible study. The participation of men, as recorded above, is incidental. The women pretend not to notice the effect they are having on those who are supposed to learn in church and then teach their wives at home. But that effect is not the least of the many benefits flowing from this wide-awake and enthusiastic body of Christian women.

There is no reason in the world why every town in the United States should not have a Bible class of the Mrs. Menninger type. All that is needed is to add daily Bible study to the duties of the "Ladies' Aid," give it the right of way, and the start is made. The results in Topeka and many other places where Mrs. Menninger's ideas have been adopted are bound to follow.

somehow to do it; and as time is not money in Africa, they are never in a hurry. One is not surprised to learn that sometimes it takes a woman a week to have her hair properly arranged.

Child life in Africa has few pleasures and many sorrows, and is in a state of constant reversal and change. From the time of a boy's birth until he has gone through the "devil bush," he is little thought of; but as soon as he has passed through its terrible ordeals and practices, he is regarded as a man and an asset in the native community. With a girl it is different. It is very hard to procure girls for the mission stations, because they are considered specially valuable as workers and possible money-bringers until the period arrives for them to enter and pass through the "gree-gree" bush ordeal. Then they are regarded as women and eligible for marriage, and their industrial value decreases. Still, if they raise large families, their market value keeps up in a measure, for in certain sections of Africa tribal custom permits a man to sell, loan or rent out his wives, or keep them in household slavery, or give them their freedom. Freedom is conferred by presenting the wife with the long tooth of a leopard, which indicates that she is no longer a slave, but a free woman—not a divorced wife.

Some magnificent missionary work is being accomplished in Africa, but it is little when we consider the tremendous need. The earnest desire of many kings and of whole tribes is for missionaries and mission schools. Mohammedanism is fast pressing into the hinterland and occupying the centers which Christianity should possess. By making converts of these pagans, the Moslems raise an effectual barrier against the Cross, and the missionaries find it hard to get a ready hearing for the Gospel. Christian converts are few and some of the European governments will not tolerate Christian missions in sections where Mohammedans are located. Yet, wherever pure Christianity is taught, practiced and lived out by wise, tactful missionaries, it finds a lodgment in the mind and heart of the natives. Then the Crescent cannot displace the Cross, and the work goes forward in a remarkable manner.

There is a faint gleam of promise shining through the gloom, and Africa is now turning slowly toward God. In many places thousands are embracing the precious Gospel. Now is the time for American Christians, above all others, to enter these overripe harvest fields and take them for God. All know that the United States has absolutely no selfish or territorial aspirations in any part of the world; hence her missionaries are looked upon with greater favor and less suspicion than those of other lands.

THE JEW

THEY would not play with me at school,
And as I older grew,
I was debarred from social ranks—
Because I was a Jew.

Last night I drank my bitterest pain,
When, of all people, you
Turned from me with the self-same taunt—
"Because you are a Jew."

King of the Jews, despised of men,
Forgive thy chosen few;
And when I meet thee, love me most Because I am a Jew.

Gentlemen:
In 1892 I bought a fountain pen in San Francisco. That pen was my companion through Princeton College, and was used to take notes in a thousand lectures. It went with me to the theological seminary, and helped me out in a thousand more lectures. It was my faithful friend during nine years in the pastorate. It has been in my hand through six years of editorial work. I presume that at least seven million words have been written with it. It has never failed me, never leaked, and never balked. The cap was lost, and once the dealer supplied a new barrel when the point was nearly to be fixed. But the pen is still on duty. Twenty-one years old, but not retired yet! For I am writing this letter with it now.
Very truly yours,
J. T. F.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. S. F. G., Yonkers, N. Y. (in a letter to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League). I have become so discouraged. I seem to have lost my power in prayer.

Prayer is simply the wire that brings the electricity of God's power down to our needs. It is true that we have no "power," no spiritual power, in ourselves. All we can do is to make way for God's power in us. "It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleasure." You say you seem to have lost your power in prayer. It may prove to be a very helpful and useful thing to you to feel just that way. You are finding out what we must all find out before God can do greater things for us and through us, that you have no power of your own. "When I am weak, then am I strong," wrote Paul. The best way to pray is to realize that we have not only no power of our own, but not even any wisdom of our own to ask for the things we need most. We must seek God directly: get into touch with him; ask him what he wants us to have, what he wants us to do. This leads us to a new conception of God's will. We begin to realize how strong it is; we begin to feel sure that God will work out his will in our lives. We cannot compel the wills of other people to yield to God, but when our own wills are absolutely surrendered to him, and our faith takes hold upon him, he will not only work out his own will in us, but will show us how best to persuade others also to yield their lives to him. Do not worry; do not fret; do not doubt. Leave everything to the infinite power of God, and trust him to do the very best for you, and, through you, for those you love.

Mrs. A. E. C. If a member of a church committed a wrong many years ago, but tries now to be faithful in church work, is it necessary to make a public confession of the wrong, stating what it was? Is it not enough to confess that some wrong was committed and to say that it has been repented of and God's forgiveness asked?

If the wrong was done to some particular person or persons, God's forgiveness cannot be secured until the wrong has been confessed to the person or persons concerned, if they can be found, and until it has been, so far as possible, made right. Many sins are between the soul and God alone, and these sins it is not necessary to confess to any one but God. Many Christians lose their peace by taking the attitude of unwillingness to confess, when they are perfectly under no obligation to confess. What robs them of their peace is not their failure to confess, but their refusal to say to God that they will do anything he wants them to do. Do not be afraid of God. He will not ask you to will nor ask you to do anything grotesque or unreasonable. Tell him you will confess as and when he wishes. Then search the case, with the Holy Spirit's help, and see if there are any people to whom you should confess personal wrongs or with whom you should make social matters straight. God will give you grace and courage to make the confession and restitution frankly and fully. But remember you are saved not by confession or restitution, nor even repentance, but by faith in Christ.

E. R., Homestead, Pa. In what sense did Paul fail? Did he begin to become a castaway?

In the well-known passage in I Cor. 9: 2, Paul implies that it is, with all his power to others, and seeks to keep self-denying watch. Persons are always often, and might run fail short of the special reward for which he strives. Some were among the Corinthians, who were going backward in the extreme of Christian liberty, apply the lesson to their own lives." It is to be noted that the Revised Version instead of using the word "castaway," adopts the paraphrase translation "rejected," i. e., a loser in the special contest for the reward of those who "run many to righteousness."

Mrs. J. E., Denver, Iowa. Are Christians under the law given to Moses or those free? If so, please explain Gal. 3 and 4. Christ said he came not to destroy the law, but to fulfill it. But if we are not under the law what law are we under? And where was it given? And by whom?

It is impossible to explain the teachings of the New Testament on this subject, such as the two chapters you mention, without recognizing two distinct meanings of the word "law" as applied to the old dispensation. It means both the moral law and the ceremonial law. The New Testament is very clear in teaching that from the ceremonial law the believer in Christ is set free. Christ put an end to the sacrifices and ceremonies of the temple when he became the sacrificial Lamb for the sins of the whole world. The 15th chapter of Acts shows how the first church council set the Gentile Christians free from the obligations of the ceremonial law, even the fundamental ordinance of circumcision. When we come to the moral law the explanation is more difficult. Paul says: "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid. Yea, we establish the law." Rom. 3: 31. The moral law was never abrogated. Paul's argument is that law in itself has no power to make a man good; but Christ has that power. Christ takes the law and fills it full of life and love. He transforms the soul so that it loves the Lawgiver and loves every individual for whose protection the law was given. For instance: is the Christian under the law against murder? He has no such sensation, no such consciousness. He does not want to murder anybody. By Christ's power he has been made to love his neighbor and he knows that he must continue to love him. Love solves the problem of the moral law; love gives the law a power it never had before. "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." Rom. 13: 10. In a sense this was taught in the Mosaic law, as both Christ and Paul pointed out, but Christ brought a new interpretation and a new power. So we may be said to be living under his law, as Paul expressed it: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." Gal. 6: 2. We are in the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, who brings to our hearts the experience of loving God (Rom. 5: 5), and who makes us truly love our neighbor.

Old Soldier, Sibley, Iowa. The man who reported you as a deserter when you had a furlough in your pocket did you a wrong, it is true, but he may have believed he was doing right and that you had no furlough. He may have regretted it afterwards when he found he was mistaken. But even if he did not regret it or show any desire to admit his error, you should hold no malice in your heart toward him. The one who conceives and does a mean, dishonest or untruthful act injures himself more than he hurts the object of his malice. You say you are a Christian. Here is an opportunity for you to show the Christlike spirit, and forgive him. And if you let him know that you have forgiven him, you will find that the "hard feeling" you have cherished against him will soon die out altogether. Remember, the Master instructed his followers to forgive their enemies.

A. S., Lidell, Calif. Many of the prophecies in the Bible have been fulfilled, as, for instance, the downfall of Babylon and Nineveh, the destruction of Jerusalem, the captivity of the Jews, the prophecies relating to Christ, and many others. When God lets a prophetic word "fall to the ground," he proves its falsity. Many of the prophecies that relate to the close of this age, the Jewish restoration, and the approach of the millennium, etc., are regarded by commentators and others as still in process of fulfilment.

J. L. H., Chanute, Kan. My brother is in a very serious condition and friends have come on two occasions to pray for him. I am advised to give him medicine, but these friends think it would be wrong to do so. I find no passage in the Bible admonishing us against medicine. What shall I do?

We have stated on a number of occasions that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes the prayerful use of medicine to be right and Scriptural. Isaiah put a fig poultice on King Hezekiah's boils. The bacteriological theory of disease has made the use of medicine all the more reasonable. We have found that many diseases are simply attacks made upon the body tissues by living organisms, quite like miniature animals. It is no more wrong to attack these diminutive animals with poison than it would be to attack, with club or gun, a mad dog who would threaten one's wife or child. Medicines produce a chemical reaction in the body which has curative or nutritive values; indeed, many medicines are foods, and to take them is not like regulating one's diet to meet physical conditions. Many skilful physicians are firm believers in prayer, and pray for the success of their treatment. God gives wisdom and skill to combat disease, and after we have granted ourselves of all these means we should ask his blessing upon them.

E. E. P., Clarksville, Tenn. God's Word is full of assurances of his readiness to hear the prayers of the repentant who turn to him from their sins. In Prov. 28: 9, the description is that of a man who, although he knows the law, ignores it and, continuing in his wickedness and injustice, without the slightest feeling of repentance in his heart, goes through the form of prayer as a mere habit. Such prayers are an offense to the Almighty. Totally different is the case of the repentant sinner, who comes to plead for forgiveness. Such a one God's own Son has assured us he will "in no wise cast out." Pray for faith and believe while you pray. Get in touch with some of the members of your church whom you know to be practical Christians, and they will help you gladly. And never for a moment believe that you have sinned beyond forgiveness. The divine love and mercy are boundless. Besides, the very fact that your heart is drawn toward God and that you are sincerely troubled over your spiritual condition, is an evidence that the Spirit is striving with you; whereas in the case of those from whom it has been withdrawn, there is absolute apathy and indifference to all things spiritual.

J. W. T., Butte, Mont. We have already published an article dealing with the new "Creation Story" from Nippur, in which Professor Langdon (as Professor Banks suggests) seems to have unaccountably confused the identities of Adam and Noah. The other article you mention deals with a kind of evolutionary philosophy which is so wholly conjectural that it does not interest us.

K. McM., Friars Hill, W. Va. The wireless signal "C. Q. D." has been popularly interpreted to mean "Come quick, danger," but this is only an amusing explanation. When wireless telegraphy first came into use "C. Q." became the recognized signal used by one ship to attract another, and it served for all stations. Its simplicity in the Morse Code recommended it; but it was soon felt that this call did not express sufficient urgency in distress; therefore, in 1904 the Marconi Company of London added "D" to it to denote "distress." The International Radiotelegraphic Convention of Berlin in 1908 substituted "S. O. S.," which is more easily sounded, and now in turn this call, it is said, is to be superseded by "T. T. T."

Reader, Palmer, Mass. 1. With what month did the early settlers of New England begin the year prior to 1752? 2. Who is the author of the poem "My mind to me a kingdom is," and where may it be obtained?

1. With March, the same as in England, dating their legal year from the 25th of that month. 2. Edward Dyer (1550-1607); in the Home Book of Verse, published by Holt & Co., New York City.

Miscellaneous

T. M., Stockbridge, Mass. There are 5,148 Jews in Ireland, according to the census of two years ago.

S. J. G., Lewiston, Me. 1. Brooklyn became a part of New York on January 1, 1898. 2. Texas has 13,977 miles of railroad; Illinois, 13,024 miles; Pennsylvania, 10,986 miles.

M. A. W. D., Nunda, N. Y. 1. Bryn Mawr means "The Castle in the Marsh." 2. "Ca-Ira" means "It will go on." It was the name of a famous song during the French Revolution.

Mrs. J. S. B., South Jacksonville, Fla. 1. The Roman Empire fell in 476 A.D. 2. Clovis was the great chief of the Franks at that time. France, as a nation, did not exist before the tenth century.

O. B. B., Orange, Calif. The prohibition States are Maine (1864), Kansas (1880), North Dakota (1890), Georgia (1907), Tennessee (1907), Oklahoma (1907), North Carolina (1909), Mississippi (1909) and West Virginia (1914).

R. B., Quincy, Ill. It is claimed that northeastern Siberia is the coldest section on earth. At Verkhoyansk a temperature of 90.4 below zero Fahrenheit was recorded January 15, 1885, the lowest ever reported at a regular meteorological station.

R. C. M., Woodbridge, Conn. Each Mission Board has its own well-defined standard of qualifications for workers under it on the foreign field. As these standards differ, the only way to learn the facts is to apply to the secretaries of the various boards for information on the subject.

Mrs. B. D. M., Granville, N. Y. In his recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Professor Banks pointed out that, even before Abraham's day, there were accounts of the Flood preserved in tablet form by those early Eastern nations, and he expressed the hope that a still earlier tablet might yet be found. He nowhere gives the impression that these tablets displaced the Bible history. They are simply variants of the great tradition which seems to have been widely held from immemorial days.

A. S., Burton, Neb. The offense for which the Nicolaitans were condemned has given rise to much conjecture. They are believed to have attempted to graft on the Christian faith pagan licentiousness and idolatry. One writer says: "They made their liberty a cloak for cowardice and licentiousness and united brave words with evil deeds. They mingled themselves in the orgies of idolatrous feasts, and brought the impurities of those feasts into the meetings of the Christian Church. All this was done as part of a system, supported by a doctrine, accompanied by the boast of a prophetic illumination." (II Peter 2: 1, 2.)

Share Your Blessings*

THERE is a popular hymn: "Count Your Blessings." It is a good thing to count your blessings, but there is something still better to do with them—share them.

Is it true that this subject strikes us with a little bit of chill, as if it were going to be somewhat bothersome? Are we afraid that we must hear again the old morals and exhortations about doing what other people like instead of what we ourselves like; of giving things away instead of enjoying them ourselves; of leading a difficult, uncomfortable, unnatural life instead of the happy, wholesome, carefree life we long for?

But let us see. There is something strikingly familiar about those last words: "happy, wholesome, care-free." A great teacher once made words like that a fundamental part of his teaching. His name was Jesus. The Bible versions we are familiar with make the verses that we call the "Beatitudes" begin with "Blessed." Robert Young, editor of the famous concordance, published a translation of the Bible in which, throughout that passage, the word is "Happy." Happy are the poor in spirit; happy are the meek; happy are the merciful; happy are the pure, etc. That was what Jesus came to tell folks: How to be happy. His degree is "Doctor of Happiness." Don't be afraid to trust your case in his hand.

This is his plan. He wants to make everybody happy. In doing this he needs hosts of friends who will help him. He finds that people have greater success in making others happy if they are happy themselves, so he proceeds to make them happy. Happiness overflows. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine." Prov. 17: 22. It is the overflowing spring that refreshes the greatest number of travelers. One of Christ's great words was "abundant." So do not be afraid that when Christ asks you to help him make people happy by sharing your blessings with them he is going to make your own happiness less. He is going to make it greater—vastly, splendidly greater. The minute he finds he can trust you to be one of his blessing-spreaders, he will begin to give you more and more blessing to spread. Blessings will come to you from both directions, from him, and from the people you make glad.

Suppose you like to play the piano, or to paint pictures. Now it seems to be true that to do really the best artistic work one must enjoy it; must do it largely for the love of it, for the enjoyment it brings to him. The more he himself enjoys the doing of it, the more will others be made happy who listen and look.

It is the same way with friendships. The one who enjoys his friendships and companionships, who gets real happiness out of them, will have friends and companions plenty, and will give lots of gladness to them.

We are led at last to that big little word which we find at the end of so many of our discussions—Love. If we love people two things happen. We get gladness and we give gladness. We get gladness out of our love for them, and we give gladness both because we give them our love and because that love leads us to do definite, detail things to make their burdens lighter and their joys bigger.

We said Christ will increase your blessings when he finds you are willing to share them with others. That does not necessarily mean that he will give you a lot of money and goods to give to others. This is one of the real tragedies of life—that so many people who are eager to give have little or nothing to give. But if you look sharp you will find you have something. A talent, a disposition, a knack of doing something in a cheerful, different way, some little opportunity, some means of lowly service—that is just the thing he has put into your hands so that some of his folks can be made glad.

One thing further must be said, which may seem to contradict part of what has gone before. To sympathize means to "suffer with." We cannot truly sympathize without really suffering. The lacks and pains of others will grieve and hurt and burden us. But with the new burden and hurt and grief will come a new zest, a new kind of happiness, new both in quantity and quality, as we realize that we can help them and as our efforts to help them bring us new power and new skill and new means to help them further.

Share your blessings? Of course. One who has caught a vision of Jesus and heard his voice cannot do otherwise.

* "SHARE YOUR BLESSINGS." Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for Sunday, September 20, 1914. Heb. 13: 16-21.

League Studies*

THREE good books: The Church of the First Apostles, by Drs. Morgan and Taylor; The Social Creed of the Churches, by Dr. Harry F. Ward; Our Greatest Common Destroyer, by Harry G. McCain and E. D. Pickett.

These are the books selected by Epworth League authorities for class study this fall. They all relate to social service. The study plan provides for taking up missions in January. The books suggested are arranged to be covered in eight weeks.

The first book tells about the early church of the apostles. Many of the church's problems would be solved if we could get back to the spirit and power and simplicity of that early church. We could make a greater impression than we are making upon American life; against American vices and faults than we are making. This book will help your League and your church to become truly Pentecostal. The second book shows what present-day churches are doing to get under the social problems of our day and help to their solution. It will help to connect up your league and church with these big things and show you how you can help. The last book discusses the great temperance question and will show you how you can do some things to rid America of the curse of strong drink.

Choose the book you like best. Select a leader whose heart is in the work and who has the Spirit in his heart. Feel that your class, though small, is linked to vast movements, and that if you are faithful, prayerful, interested, God will show you a way to help in his mighty plans.

Trouble-Savers

For the Users of No-Rim-Cut Tires

These are four of the greatest features ever employed in tire making.

Each combats, in the best way known, one of the major tire troubles.

All four are exclusive to Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires. That is why these tires rule. No other tire in the world today has so many users.

The Four

To end rim-cuts, these tires alone have our No-Rim-Cut feature. It completely wipes out this chief cause of tire ruin, in the only satisfactory way that's known.

To save blow-outs (to remove one of the main causes of them) we give these tires an "On-Air" cure at an extra cost of $1,500 daily. No other maker does that.

To combat loose treads, we form in each tire, by a patent method, hundreds of large rubber rivets. They reduce this risk 60 per cent.

For an anti-skid we give you our double-thick All-Weather tread. It is flat and smooth and regular, so it runs like a plain tread. But it grasps wet roads with deep, sharp, resistless grips.

You Want Them

You want these trouble-savers. Every motorist wants them. This is to urge you to get them.

Hundreds of thousands get them now in Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires. No man gets them in any other tire.

You get with them in Goodyears, in every way, the utmost in quality tires. And you get them at prices which mammoth production has reduced to the farthest limit.

They mean to you safety, sturdiness, strength—maximum mileage and minimum trouble. And any dealer, if you ask him, will supply you these premier tires.

For your own sake, get them.

DR. GLADDEN'S "ANTI-PAPAL PANIC"

.. correspondent criticizes his extraordinary contribution to the Roman question

A CARICATURE—that is what every calm and cool-headed observer and every halfway well-informed judge of the agitation in our country against the political aggression of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church will call Dr. Gladden's article "The Anti-Papal Panic" in Harper's Weekly for July 18. The writer wastes three precious columns of closely printed space in drawing a sensational picture of the fear which has obsessed Protestants throughout the country, who imagine that they are in imminent danger of being massacred any hour by Roman Catholics. They cast stealthy looks of suspicion at their Catholic neighbors; they pass Catholics on the street with a scowl on their faces; they lie awake nights in dread fear and anguish, expecting every moment to hear the wild alarum of Catholic bugles calling Catholic conspirators from their hiding-places in the basements of Catholic churches, where they have held secret meetings, stored arms, and plotted death and destruction to Protestants for a long time, etc., etc. The only tangible fact which the writer adduces to render the airy product of his lurid fancy at least one per cent. matter is a ridiculous occurrence at Toledo some time ago. He builds up a pyramid of fiction, with the apex downward, on a grain of fact. In all the host of Protestants who have declared their conviction that political Rome is a menace to our republic, how many are there whom the portraiture of Dr. Gladden would fit?

He declares that these panicky Protestants have discovered some mediæval papal pronunciamentos which have no meaning at the present time, and that they have fabricated a bull of Leo XIII which declares that the American republic must be overthrown and all heretics must be put to death. Again we ask: What Protestants did this? and how many were there that were duped, in particular, by the last-named piece of silliness? The wealth of documentary evidence reaching down to the most recent times, which proves the political ambition of Rome in our country, and which has been set forth by very sober men who carefully weigh their words before they utter them, and who would frown upon any breach of the decorum in a public argument, the respect which these Protestant critics of political Rome have avowed for the religious rights and liberties of their Catholic fellow citizens — all these facts Dr. Gladden has sovereignly ignored.

His study of the condition which he pretends to describe reminds us of the gentleman who, being asked what another gentleman looked like, remembered only that the party had a wart on his nose. In Dr. Gladden's view, the Protestant resistance to the aggression of political Rome is all wart and deformity. For the few lame remarks which Dr. Gladden makes in the second half of his article about political designs of some Roman hierarchs which were not well "concealed," were plainly made to save his Protestant face.

The whole article of Dr. Gladden is disingenuous. It is a sign of the times that he, being a Protestant, could write it, and that Harper's, which has been generally recognized as a Protestant periodical, if it had any religious leanings at all, could publish it. In a well-written editorial in the Presbyterian for July 29, we are reminded that lately five different magazines, commonly regarded as Protestant, have published pro-Catholic articles. We agree entirely with the editor: "Protestantism must become all the more positive and determined to resist and resent any effort looking toward the betrayal of Protestantism, or subsidizing it to Catholicism."

LITTLE DOMINGO

How Domingo Escaped

ON THE east side of the island of Negros, in the Philippines, the mountains recede from the shore just far enough to leave room for the little town of Himalalud at their foot. A little way up the mountain, Domingo lived with his father, mother and five brothers and sisters. One Sabbath day his father had been in the town and had heard some speakers telling of a new religion that was free for all men, and he began to take his family down to hear, and soon they learned to sing the hymns that they heard. They invited their friends, and told them the story of the Saviour and taught them also the hymns, so that their house began to be the center for a kind of crude Christian Endeavor meeting, and finally the family promised the pastor to be baptized at the next communion.

One day, the teniente of the district in which they lived, being a sort of sub-officer of the government and having charge of the district, sent out and commanded ten men to meet him at a certain brook the next night. The men gathered there, and the teniente told them that the family of little Domingo was afflicted with witches and must be killed. So they set off in the evening and came to the house while the family were eating supper. Making some pretext of talking with the father, they entered and the carnage began. First the father, then the mother, then the five brothers and sisters were slaughtered with bolos. Little Domingo was standing behind his mother when she was killed and she fell on him, so that the murderers did not find him. In the confusion he slipped out and escaped; and at the communion service he appeared and was baptized as he had promised, with the stains of his mother's blood still upon his clothing. He is to-day under the care of an ignorant old uncle there in the mountain. Perhaps he is to be one of those who come out of great tribulation, and whose garments are to be made white.

I might add that the teniente and his ten men have been sentenced to life imprisonment.

A GREAT POET'S PICTURE OF WAR*

NEWSPAPER reports give but scant ideas of what war actually is. Alfred Noyes in his terrible book, The Wine-Press, tells a tale and paints pictures which are convincing and heart-breaking commentaries on General Sherman's ultimate and unanswerable definition. The barbarities described as taking place in Johann's home are supposed to have no place in what is ridiculously called "civilized" warfare, but such barbarities did take place even in the second Balkan War. And the scenes from the battlefield are actualities of warfare. The poem appeared some months ago, but it is a book to read now, in these days when the hell of war has broken forth again.

Johann, a Balkan peasant, lives with his young wife, Sonia, and their little babe, Dodi, in a cottage in the forest. He has not yet told her that the call to war has sounded and that in the morning he must leave her to join his regiment. She is putting her baby to sleep.

"O little blue pigeons, sleep ... Dodi's nose,
She murmured. "Sleep, little rose, in your cozy bed."

She stood behind Johann. Around her eye
Her soft hands closed. "Dodi's asleep," she said.

Johann, wounded in battle, sends home to Sonia by the hands of a young neighbor Michael, a poetic Greek, whose eyes have been shot out in battle, the bullet from his wound. In the meantime it is through scenes like these that he has been passing.

The rifles flogged their wallowing herds,
Flogged them down to die.
Down on their slain the slayers lay,
And the shrapnel thrashed them into the clay,
And tossed their limbs like tattered birds
Through a red volcanic sky.

He yelled like a wolf to drown the cry
Of his own soul in pain.
To stifle the God in his own breast,
He yelled and cursed and struck with the rest,
And the blood bubbled over his boots
And greased his hands again.
Faces like drowned things underfoot
Slipped as he swung around,
A red mouth crackled beneath his boot
Like thorns in a spongy ground.

While Michael, in rapturous terms, is picturing for Sonia the glories of the Christian conquest of Jerusalem, word comes that the allies now are fighting among themselves.

Johann is able to take the field again. His regiment is retreating.

And the guns, the guns that drove them,
Had thundered with his own!
The men he must kill for a little pay
Had marched beside him yesterday!
Brothers in blood! By what foul lips
Was this war-trumpet blown?

The second war, the war of the allies, is nearly done, and Johann finds himself near home. He sees the little forest path running to his door. There is a sudden wild charge of hostile men through the forest, and Johann hides under a heap of slain. Then he runs on homeward, down the familiar path.

The embers of his hut still burned;
And in the deep blue gloom,
His bursting eyeballs yet could see
A white shape under the apple tree,
A naked body dabbled with red,
Like a drift of apple-bloom.

She lay like a broken sacrament
That the dogs have defiled.
"Sonia! Sonia! Speak to me!"
He babbled like a child.

Her baby, dead and mutilated, lay on her knees. Their friend Michael, the blinded Greek poet, hung crucified in the apple tree.

A New Herniał Appliance

This Invention Holds More Firmly, Comfortably and Surely Than Any Truss.

Sent on Trial

The new Brooks Appliance for rupture so thoroughly meets every test and requirement that it is ordered by the U. S. War Dept. and is recognized as the most reliable support ever invented. It is fitted with an Automatic Air Cushion which follows every movement of the body and always covers the ruptured spot. The cushion which comes in contact with the skin is soft, pliable gum rubber and clings closely, so that slipping is impossible, and it is cool and comfortable because of the constant circulation of air through it.

This Appliance is sold under a positive guarantee of money refunded if not satisfactory. We do not guarantee to cure any more than any doctor will guarantee to cure his patient. We do guarantee to furnish a perfect fitting Appliance, which will give the wearer solid comfort and retain the protrusion at all times. The purchaser is the sole judge and if for any reason whatever (which does not have to be furnished us) it is returned, the price paid will be refunded in full.

Souvenirs From the Holy Land

To every one who fills out one of these Coupons according to the conditions we will send FREE of Charge a Special Souvenir personally selected in the Holy Land by the President of The Christian Herald

Last spring Mr. Koenig, President of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, visited the Holy Land in quest of special features for your favorite paper, and in the course of his pilgrimage collected a number of souvenirs.

These souvenirs consist of pebbles from the Dead Sea, shells from the Sea of Galilee, with actual photographs showing these souvenirs being collected by natives and members of the American Colony, baked clay lamps made in the time of our Lord, pressed flowers of Palestine, and beautiful post cards showing colored views of the Holy Land.

These souvenirs, necessarily limited in number, will be presented with our compliments to CHRISTIAN HERALD workers who send us one or more of the coupons shown on this page properly endorsed.

Each coupon calls for a four-months' new subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at half price. They are offered by us at this season in order to give our friends an opportunity to help spread the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by placing it in homes where it has never before been read.

We are sure every friend will welcome such an opportunity not only to extend the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but to possess each for him or herself one of these genuine souvenirs which Mr. Koenig has brought back from the Holy Land, and which therefore can be accepted as a genuine memento of his visit.

None of these treasured objects is for sale, but any of our friends who will influence new subscriptions for four months, at half the regular price, may possess one. If you cannot induce a friend to subscribe for half price, you may make a present of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a friend or acquaintance, in which case you will fill out one or more coupons and mail them to us at once, and the souvenir or souvenirs to which you are entitled will be sent you FREE of charge.

These Souvenirs Are for You

Given for ONE COUPON

For sending us one coupon properly endorsed and accompanied by the proper remittance we will send you free a card containing beautiful pressed flowers from the Holy Land tastefully arranged in a decorative design.

Given for TWO COUPONS

For two coupons we will send you free seven beautiful post-cards containing colored views of the Holy Land. These cards were purchased by Mr. Koenig in Jerusalem. They comprise views of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Garden of Gethsemane, Dead Sea, Grotto of the Nativity, etc., etc.

Given for THREE COUPONS

An olive wood paperweight especially cut and polished in the Holy Land with the word "Jerusalem" stamped upon it in English and Hebrew. This will make a tasteful ornament for your desk.

Given for FOUR COUPONS

For four coupons we will send a collection of pebbles picked up on the shores of the Dead Sea and shells from the Sea of Galilee accompanied by a proper authentication of their genuineness and a picture of natives gathering them.

Given for FIVE COUPONS

For five coupons we will send a clay lamp, like those used in the time of Christ, and referred to by him in the parable of the wise and foolish virgins. These lamps are genuine antiques, made in the time of Christ.

Given for SIX COUPONS

For six coupons we will send you a genuine Bibleland tablet covered with cuneiform characters engraved thereon by a scribe who lived in ancient Babylonia in the time of Abraham, about 2300 before Christ.

GRAND EXTRA REWARD

To every person sending us six coupons properly endorsed and accompanied by 25 cents each, we will send in addition to the Bibleland tablet mentioned above, seven actual photographs (not half-tones) taken by Mr. Koenig himself in the Holy Land, showing Excavations at Samaria, Jaffa Gate, Jerusalem, City of Tiberias, Pool of Moses, Shepherd Boys Visiting Jerusalem, Mary's Well, Nazareth, Eastern Wall of Jerusalem.

Every day, legions of people get rid of their corns with Blue-jay. This easy method now removes a million corns a month.

You who suffer with corns do yourselves an injustice. Blue-jay will instantly stop the pain. And in 48 hours, without any soreness, the corn comes out completely.

About half the people know this now. When a corn appears they put Blue-jay on it. Then they forget it In a couple of days they lift out the corn and bid it good-bye forever

You can't do that by paring corns. And you can't with old-time treatments You may get relief for a little while, but the corns simply stay and grow.

Try this modern, scientific way—the way now employed by physicians and hospitals. Get rid of the corn. It is just as easy, just as painless as the ineffective ways.

THE WINNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THERE is a winner in every game—the game of love, of life, of death. There are also winners in many other phases of life that can hardly be classed as games, people who come out on top through luck, or hard work, or perseverance.

I do not think that Cora B. West, whose picture is shown on this page, counted on luck in the Money Makers' Club. I do know, however, that she has crept up steadily since it was organized, and that now, because of her clever work and stick-to-it-iveness, we are glad to introduce her as the winner of the first club pin. We sent it to her early in August.

Cora B. West has been a pen-and-ink friend of mine ever since, almost, my department in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was started. Many letters have passed between us and she has confided her joys and sorrows to me until I feel that I know her very well indeed. I think a very few of the things that she has said about the club will interest you. Her first club letter was something like this:

FIRST PIN WINNER

"I have read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for so long that I am very much interested in everything new that is spoken of. Now that you have started a club for the girls who read your talks, I am more excited about it than you can imagine! I want to make money, and I want to be a club member, and I want, most of all, to own a club pin."

In a few months that were punctuated regularly with messages, enthusiastic, or vague, but never discouraged (perhaps that was the secret of her success), I was able to write and tell her that she was the first winner of a club pin. As swiftly as the mail could carry her answer over half a continent, I received a happy little line of writing.

"I have not received the pin yet," it ran, "but I am so pleased to know that I am going to have it that I simply could not work today. I will write and tell you as soon as it reaches me."

A day later I found this letter on my desk:

"My Dearest Friend:

"The dear little pin has just come and it is a beauty. I have fastened it on, for I am going out to lunch and I do not want to have it far away from me. If you were here I could kiss you and thank you properly for it, but on paper I can only tell you how much I love it."

It isn't an awfully comfortable feeling to know that you have chosen a pin to be given to hundreds of girls; but, friends of mine, when I read that letter, it made my very soul feel all warm, and sweet, and comfortable, for I knew that the girls—my girls—were going to take the little Flower of Happiness into their hearts.

Speaking of the Flower of Happiness makes me remember a letter I found on my desk a few mornings ago. I am going to copy it, word for word:

"Please send me the plans of the Money Makers' Club, for I am a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and I do want to know what the club is like. The name of your pin interests me especially, because it makes me think of some verses which I am very fond of.

"Perhaps you already know them, for they must be known to all lovers of poetry.

"Did you ever find the Happiness Flower?
It isn't so hard to find—
It opens wide at the morning hour
In the meadows of Cheerful Mind.
But it sometimes grows in the sandy dust
That fills the desert of Care,
And down in the fields of Perfect Trust,
You will always find it there.

"It's sweet as honey, the Happiness Flower,
Winter and summer the same;
On the Difficult Hills by Troublous Tower,
It shines like a very flame.
It never wilts in the glare of Pride,
Or breaks in the wind of Woe,
But softly under its leaves will hide
The light of its lovely glow.

"If you ever find the Happiness Flower—
And it isn't so hard to find—
By the rainbow's end in an April shower,
Where the tears and the smiles are twined;
May it flourish fair in your garden ground,
Aglisten with Joy's bright dew,
May the sunshine of Love the whole year round
Lie warm on your Flower—and you."

This is a pretty long verse for me to quote, girls dear, but I want you to read it, and digest it thoroughly. I hope that the author of the poem, whoever he or she may be, can know what pleasure it has given our club. I hope that you all may find your Happiness Flower, and I hope that you will all be bathed in the sunshine of Love.

Now, friends of mine, this club game is different from almost any other in one respect. For in races, and contests, and lessons and hard unadulterated toil, there are only a limited number who come out ahead, while in the game we offer any number can win the Happiness Flower. I can, you can, Cora B. West did!

We once had an old colored woman who did our washing for us—a woman of infinite blackness and indefinite years. With sighs and rolling eyeballs she often used to tell me "befo' de wah" stories—how everything had been luxury and peace and splendor, while after the war, she had suffered much unhappiness and trouble. She had been thrown upon her own resources, with a family of small pickaninnies who needed every care. Vainly she had hunted for work, and after many discouragements she had begun to do washing for families. Now, an old woman, she owned a small bank account, and had a steady income each week from the washing that she still kept up.

"How did you manage?" I asked curiously one day.

"I done this," she told me, without pausing in her vigorous scrubbing. "I asked questions an' then I done the work."

Those are the essentials of our club. Ask one question, "What shall I do?" and follow out the answer in the little prospectus.

If you do that you can save money, I am sure; you can make people happy; and you can earn the Happiness Flower as well as other presents—numbers of them that are being planned for your special benefit. It's well worth trying!

Just as the paper was hurrying to press I got a note from one of our club winners. "The girls," she told me joyfully, "are asking about my badge. Dozens have asked me where I bought it, and when I tell them that I won it, they are ever so much surprised."

Just at present Cora B. West is the only girl in the country who is wearing a pin like the illustration. Girls dear, don't let her be the only club winner for very long.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

MRS. C. J. W. is requested to communicate with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office. A letter has come which indicates that her prayers will be answered.

Many churches and organizations are appointing special hours of prayer for the speedy ending of the European war and that God's will may be triumphant despite the cruel struggle. Daily prayer is being made at the Fulton Street Noon Prayer Meeting in New York, and every day at eleven (Thursdays at 10.30) at the headquarters of the National Bible Institute, New York. The members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League, in their private devotions, in home and church prayer circles, and at the daily hour of noontime petition, will continue to pray fervently that the war may be brief, that God's will may triumph, and that all the sad hearts and homes and suffering bodies may receive comfort.

M. L. B. asks prayer for a revival at Princess Anne, Va.; S. E. B., at McQueene and Looney, Okla.; Mrs. E. E. C. at Wecomico Church, Mila, Va.; Mrs. E. F. T., at Garfield, Wash.; Mrs. H. B. P., for victory of State-wide prohibition in California, at the coming election; M. L. T. in Ohio; Miss V. B. for enforcement of prohibition law in Memphis, Tenn., and that right governor of the State may be elected.

Mrs. C. L. C. writes from Kerby, Wyo.: "I wrote a short time ago asking an interest in your prayers in behalf of a son who went away three years ago and from whom I had not heard. I have now heard from him, and feel sure it was in direct answer to prayer." Another grateful mother, Mrs. C. A. S., writes: "Some time ago I wrote to the Prayer League for prayers that I would hear from an absent son, and now I write to thank them for their prayers. I have heard from him." Another mother, Mrs. M. L. T., of Perrysburg, Ohio, tells the same glad story of hearing from an absent son (this one wrote a "long letter"). Still another happy mother, Mrs. M. M. J., of Austin, Texas, writes: "I am rejoiced that I can acknowledge the answer to our prayers for the conversion of my son and the establishment of the family altar in his home." E. C. writes from New York: "I thank God for answered prayer. A very dear daughter, far in the West, who was given up by the doctors, has been spared, and will be as well as ever. Also a son, who was in need, has been helped in just the best way."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. G. J., Ozark, Ark.; L. L. B., Conewango Valley, N. Y.; A Friend, Landisburg, Pa.; B. L. A., Memphis, Mich.; Mrs. S. J. S., Grand Rapids, Mich.; A. L. J., Tacoma, Wash.; A High School Student, Pickett, Ky.; Mrs. L. L. S., Mabank, Texas; Mrs. T. C. H., Geneva, Ohio; Mrs. L. C. L., Unionville, Mo.; Mrs. J. M. S., Hopkinsville, Ky.; E. M. G., Moorhead, Miss.; H. J. V., Picton, Ontario; C. A. D., Seville, Ohio; J. G. H., Bear River, Minn.; Mrs. M. E. B., David City, Neb.; Mrs. E. D. B., Kenton, Ohio; Mrs. G. H., Los Angeles, Calif.; E. H. S., Visilia, Calif.

"I am a little girl twelve years of age," writes M. B. "And my papa used to go to church and be nice at home, but lately he has been under the influence of liquor, and does not go to church. And when he comes home he always tries to quarrel with mama and is always cross to my brother and I. Will you please pray for papa that he will stop drinking and go to church again? He is the best of fathers when he is sober. Mama tries to please him, and don't know what to do." Surely this letter will be made the subject of many sympathetic and fervent prayers. Mrs. M. H. writes: "My beloved husband, in a state of anger owing to ill-health and mental depression, left our home June 12, and has not returned. Pray that he will return and become reconciled to his family." Another forsaken wife, Mrs. E. L. McL., writes: "My husband went away nearly two months ago. I have four little children. I have a little property in another province, but we are strangers here, and I am in need of guidance and help. I get so discouraged. Pray for me." This sad letter comes from Mrs. S. T. G.: "I have been praying for help, and that my faith be strengthened. I have become discouraged and seem to have lost my power in prayer. I also want your prayer for my husband, who has been at one time a very firm Christian, that he may be brought back; also that my daughter may be restored to health." J. C. N. writes to ask again for prayer for her sister, whose mind became affected and who has had to be sent away. She writes: "Pray for my sister and me. My life is such a sad one, having lost father, mother, and brothers, and been left all alone in the world." E. G. asks prayer for healing from nervous trouble and distress. Mrs. J. A. H. requests prayer for two daughters, that they may forsake the sinful pleasures of the world, repent and live consecrated lives.

Mrs. E. J. T. asks prayer that her son's mind may be restored; Mrs. B. B., her husband's; Mrs. D. H. M., her daughter's; Mrs. M. L. M., Mrs. O. S. F., Mrs. J. C. O., Mrs. M. W., Mrs. L. H., for mental restoration or strengthening for others or for themselves. H. W. H., A Reader, Panora, Ga.; A Reader, Allentown, Pa.; L. P.; B. L. A. ask prayer that their sight may be restored; Mrs. L. H., that brother's sight may be restored; Mrs. A. B. D., her sister's; Mrs. E. W., a friend's; E. A. H., that brother's sight may not fail; J. L. B., Miss E. H., and E. J. W., that sight may be strengthened.

Mrs. E. E. P. and Mrs. G. B. H. ask prayer that their husbands be saved from the liquor habit; Mrs. W. E. R., A Reader, Lebanon, Ind., and M. A. M., sons; E. B. C. and Miss E. M. M., brothers; M. B. and A Reader, Allentown, Pa., their fathers; M. C., L. P., Miss I. S., and C. J. S., other relatives and friends.

The following friends request prayer for a deeper work of grace, the assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

Mrs. J. H. M.; F. W. M.; Mrs. F. B. K.; A Young Girl, Brandon, Man., Canada; Mrs. B. F. C.; Mrs. G. M. (that we as a family become more spiritually minded); Mrs. W. M. A.; Mrs. O. K. H.; Mrs. M. W.; B. A. R.; E. W.; Mrs. R. A. T.; M. H.; M. F.; L. P.; Mrs. R. M. DeG.; Mrs. N. W.; Mrs. H. M. C.; Mr. and Mrs. O. E. E.; Mrs. G. B. H.; A Reader, Lebanon, Ind.; C. L. B.; E. R.; E. T. J.; Mrs. G. W.; L. A. L.; Mrs. C. H. H.; Mrs. A. S.; Mrs. M. L. T.; Mrs. M. L. M.; Mrs. F. C. K.; E. A. H.; Mrs E. E. P.; J. McP.; Mrs. S. M.; Mrs. I. A. C.; Mrs. J.; E. H. S.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Heats 12-Room Home for $27.00 with an Underfeed

Meadville, Penn., Dec. 18, 1913.
Gentlemen: I have used one of your UNDERFEED furnaces for past seven years for heating our twelve room residence. Have never had a dollar's worth of repair on it—always able to keep temperature above 70 degrees throughout the house during our coldest weather—use coking coal slack for fuel—largest fuel bill covering one year's heating $27.00; smallest yearly bill $22.00. These are facts which speak for themselves.
H. C. BEMAN, President,
Beman Automatic Oil Can Co., Ltd.

Over 25,000 Underfeed Users have proved our guarantee that Williamson Underfeed furnaces and boilers cut coal bills one-half to two-thirds and deliver clean, even heat with minimum attention.

Our improved Williamson New-Feed Underfeed is the last word—the best word in heating systems. All the good points of the old Underfeed have been retained and a score of improvements added. Every possible objection has been banished. Now the attention of a 12-year-old boy twice a day for firing and once a week for removal of ashes is all that is needed.

WILLIAMSON NEW-FEED UNDERFEED Furnaces and Boilers

Cut Coal Bills ½ to ⅔

Coal in the Underfeed is fed from below, and like a candle, burns from top down. With the fire always on top, smoke and gases are consumed, making more heat with no soot, smell, smoke, clinkers or dirt, and few ashes. Cheap slack soft coal and pea or buckwheat sizes of hard coal yield in the Underfeed as much clean, even heat as highest priced coal in other heaters. Any kind or size of coal may be used. The Underfeed is adapted to warm air, steam or hot water in buildings of all kinds, large or small.

50% Saving Guaranteed We guarantee a saving over your present coal bills of at least one-half by means of the Williamson New-Feed Underfeed, when properly installed and operated. This guarantee is backed by a $1,000,000 company. Mail the coupon for our great free book "From Overfed to Underfeed." This book will surely startle you and show you how to save money.

yet opposed any real defense to this advance, though there has been some more or less severe skirmishing. This policy on the part of the Germans has probably been largely influenced by topographical conditions, I think.

The country for some hundred miles from the Russian frontier of Germany is flat, lies at or below the level of the Baltic, and is full of lakes of varying size and rather boggy and soft ground. I have only been there once, but then it reminded me very much of the Lincolnshire fen country in England. It would be a very difficult country to retreat through, and must be hard to move artillery and the train through. There are no natural defenses and very insignificant artificial ones. In all senses, it is a poor country for military operations.

Toward the Baltic the land rises, sometimes on the immediate shore attaining quite a respectable height, say two or three hundred feet. The large cities on the shore, like Koenigsberg, are fortified, and also could have the help of the German fleet, if need should be. The back country is not very thickly populated.

The first natural defense is the Vistula River, which traverses this part of Germany from the Russian frontier to the Baltic, and this natural defense is strengthened by a chain of strong places like Thorn, Graddenz, etc., along its entire length.

The Vistula, as a natural defense only, is very strong. At places, the river is a thousand yards broad, and with the bridges blown up, or otherwise removed, would in itself present a difficult problem for an invading force, defended as of course it would be.

It seems, therefore, probable that no serious defense will be made by the Germans until the Russian forces reach near this river and that then battle will be given them from the bank nearest Russia. Under these circumstances the Germans would have a good line of retreat, and the Russians a very poor one.

The Russians have now penetrated some thirty or forty miles into this East Prussian territory, at their advanced point Insterburg. Until the situation becomes more developed it is hardly worth while to dwell at length thereon.

The present Russian army is said to be greatly improved over that which took part in the war against Japan. I have seen Russian troops at work, and have always thought them, while physically brave, greatly lacking in initiative and rather poorly commanded. Perhaps it will be different this time, though I wish to warn my readers that bulletins from St. Petersburg must be taken with the traditional grain of salt, not that they mean to mislead, but imaginations there are sometimes vivid.

On the Austro-Russian border the situation the last ten days has been rather obscure. Russia announces victories by a force which she is advancing in the direction of Lemberg, in Galicia, while on the other hand Austria claims victories in Russian Poland. In all probability, both sets of victories are border skirmishes of more or less severity, a feeling out of the enemy, as it were, and without strategic importance.

I expect that there will be very heavy fighting in another twenty days in both Germany and Austria against the Russians, but it is hardly time yet.

The great difficulty both Germany and Austria will have in dealing with Russia is not so much the quality as the quantity of her forces. She has such an inexhaustible supply of men that she can stand the loss of half a million or a million without being much weakened.

In considering the campaign in northern Germany it must be remembered that there cannot be very much of a campaign conducted there after December 1. There is too much snow, and the cold is great.

On the Servian frontier Austria has abandoned the offensive for the time being in order to concentrate her forces to meet the Russian onslaught. Servia will probably be active against her, unless her attention is engaged in another direction, which is quite a possibility.

The whole Balkan situation has grown in interest during the past week, the question being what Turkey, Rumania and Bulgaria are going to do. Between them they would have a force of over a million war-seasoned troops of very good quality, and there is no doubt that there is some understanding between the three. The Turkish army is mobilized on the southern border of Bulgaria. Bulgaria has declared herself in a state of siege, which practically means mobilization, and Rumania has called the first three classes of her reserves to the colors, for exercise and training.

All three hate Servia and Russia, and all three are under the influence of the Triple Alliance powers. Inferences can easily be drawn, but they would only be possibilities. In a few more days, however, we shall know definitely.

Italy announces again her determination to remain neutral, so that both the missions sent to her, De Witte and Delcassé on the part of the Entente, and the military and diplomatic mission which visited her last week on behalf of the Alliance, have failed to move her.

In the East, Japan and England have moved against the Germans at Kiauchau, but without immediate result.

Nothing of very much consequence has occurred on the sea during the past week. The German fleet has been definitely located, the older vessels off Heligoland, the new at Kiel in the Baltic. In either place it is practically impossible for the English fleet to get at their important units. The Russian fleet remains bottled up in the Baltic, and also in the Black Sea.

Near Heligoland on the 28th, a small naval action is reported to have taken place, in which the Germans are said to have lost three small cruisers and a couple of torpedo boats. The English loss, if any, is not stated.

Germany has lost a converted cruiser, the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, sunk by the British cruiser Highflyer, off the African coast, and also a small unprotected cruiser, the Magdeburg, in the Baltic. There are conflicting stories as to how this latter met her fate.

No attack has been made on the Austrian fleet in the Adriatic by the united Mediterranean fleets of England and France, as has been anticipated. The probability is that the Adriatic has been so heavily mined as to make this attack very dangerous.

On the last two days of the week the position of the Allies' left wing became much more involved, the German turning movement developing in strength. The French are attempting to bring the army of General Pau to relieve this situation, and it looks as though the left wing of the Allies would be crushed unless this attempt were successful. This left wing includes the British force. The Germans on Saturday succeeded in cutting communication between France and England by any of the northerly routes—Calais, Boulogne, Dieppe.

During the coming week we shall probably hear of almost decisive events in France, in my opinion.

OPPORTUNITY OF AMERICAN WOMEN

AMERICAN women will surely respond to the clarion appeal made to their patriotism by Miss Ida M. Tarbell in the October Woman's Home Companion. By courtesy of that magazine we print below a condensed excerpt from the article. This stirring call is right to the point. It strikes a high note of opportunity and duty—but not too high for American womanhood:

The awful struggle to which the continent of Europe has committed itself opens to American women opportunity for a patriotic service of inestimable value. What in this crisis is the highest obligation of these United States of America—neutrality aside? It is to see that no man is idle, no wheel stops. Patriotism demands that our factories and mines and mills be kept open and busy. The crisis has brought us face to face with what we have not—ships, for instance—with what we can not do for ourselves. Of all the tens of thousands of American women who crowded Europe when war seized her, there was scarcely one that was not planning to bring home all her income allowed of finery. It is so every year. And what sums they leave behind! And more important, what stimulus to art and ingenuity they leave behind, though it is only by money we can measure it.

These personal importations are but a bagatelle beside those of merchants, which in many lines run into the tens of millions annually. Why do we do it? "Because"—any woman of taste and knowledge will tell you this—"I can get in European products more beauty of design, more 'snap' in style, more cunning in details, more durability in material." And why?

Are American manufacturers and designers incapable of this superior craftsmanship and art? No, the truth is that American women have never given them a fair opportunity to prove what they can do. As pliable, durable, and beautifully finished silks as there are in the world can be made here in quantities. But where is the American woman who boasts that she wears American silks?

The day has come for the American woman to wake up to her duty to the industries of this country. This is her time to learn what her own country's industries can do, and to rally with all her influence to their support, urging them to make the things she wants, pledging them her allegiance.

The world has seen in these days wonderful outbursts of patriotism. Is it only war which is to stir men and women to effort and thought and sacrifice? Has patriotism nothing to do with peace, with the daily efforts of men? The Great Patriotism is that which serves one's land consciously and steadily in all the relations of life. The American woman of taste and means has never fully recognized her relation to her country's industries. Now is her time to awake.

To keep the American people at work through this crisis; to show the world what patriotic peace means, as opposed to patriotic war—that is our duty as a nation. One of the most substantial contributions that the American woman can make to the fulfilment of this duty is to give steady, intelligent support to American industries.

FOOD FACTS

What An M. D. Learned

A prominent Georgia physician went through a food experience which he makes public.

"It was my own experience that first led me to advocate Grape-Nuts food and I also know, from having prescribed it to convalescents and other weak patients, that the food is a wonderful rebuilder and restorer of nerve and brain tissue, as well as muscle. It improves the digestion and sick patients gain very rapidly, just as I did in strength and weight.

"I was in such a low state that I had to give up my work entirely, and went to the mountains of this state, but two months there did not improve me; in fact, I was not quite as well as when I left home.

"My food did not sustain me and it became plain that I must change. Then I began to use Grape-Nuts food and in two weeks I could walk a mile without fatigue, and in five weeks returned to my home and practice, taking up hard work again. Since that time I have felt as well and strong as I ever did in my life.

"As a physician who seeks to help all sufferers, I consider it a duty to make these facts public." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Trial 10 days of Grape-Nuts, when regular food does not seem to sustain the body, works wonders. "There's a Reason."

HUDSON Six-40 1915 Model $1,550 This Year F.O.B. Detroit

Our Level-Best Six

This new HUDSON Six-40, despite its price, marks our level best. Our 48 engineers, headed by Howard E. Coffin, have devoted four years to the car. In reply to all conflicting claims—defending higher prices—that's the most that we can say.

This car is the climax of HUDSON ambitions. We may do better sometime, but we can't today.

There is hardly a part or detail which we find a wish to better. In fine engineering, in beauty and comfort, in lightness and economy, this car comes near the apex, we believe.

We say this after thousands have been tested on the road. After 12 months' experience with our last year's Six-40. After noting all the new-year models which our rivals have brought out. And we believe that most men will agree with us.

Its 48 Designers

There are 48 men—there have been for years—on the HUDSON corps of engineers. And Howard E. Coffin heads them.

It has never been claimed, so far as we know, that there is an abler corps in the country. And certainly there isn't.

In HUDSON models—constantly progressing—these men have fought over-tax. They have warred with all excesses—in weight and price, in upkeep and operative cost.

And this HUDSON Six-40 for 1915 marks the final result of their efforts.

Do Opinions Differ?

There are arguments, of course, which combat ours. Each maker defends his own. But we doubt if well-informed men seriously differ about this car.

HUDSON advances have always been combated. But the records show that the general trend has followed where we led.

Sixes are almost universal now in the upper grade of cars. Lightness is now demanded. Economy has been studied. Prices have come down. And HUDSON innovations in beauty and equipment are being fast adopted.

The HUDSON Six-40 this year differs from its leading rivals merely in degree of progress. It simply leads the common trend.

Where Hudson Leads

The HUDSON Six-40 leads in lightness among cars of this capacity. It reduces old-time averages about 1,000 pounds.

This lightness, plus a new-type motor, gives it class-lead in low operative cost.

It leads in beauty. In numerous ways it leads all in new styles of equipment.

In the quality field it holds the low-priced record, for cars that compare in size, class and capacity. Since last year, our trebled output has reduced the price $200.

And, in designing, skill—not luck—has given this car amazingly perfect balance.

You'll Approve It

The more exacting you are, the better you'll approve this car. It will meet your conceptions in the things you want. In big ways and little ways it will show you today's best standards. We spent all last year on details and refinements.

Go see it, and bear this in mind: We build a larger car for the men who want it. But we could not, with our present knowledge, build a better car.

THE BLOOD-RED WORLD (Ezekiel 7 : 23)

"SILENT SUFFERERS" NEED OUR HELP

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RELIEF FUND FOR THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF THE WAR IN EUROPE NOW OPEN—AN OPPORTUNITY FOR ALL TO UNITE IN A NOBLE CHARITY

ONE of the inevitable results of war is that the suffering is not confined to the contesting forces in the field. The great war in Europe, in which over 6,000,000 men are engaged in a deadly struggle, has aroused the sympathies of the Christian world. Many thousands are already dead, while tens of thousands fill the hospitals. It is the most tremendous conflict the world has ever witnessed. No calamity to equal it has ever befallen the human race.

There is another very large class of sufferers by the war who, amid the tumult and confusion of the time, are even more entitled to our sympathy and help than any others. These are the thousands of helpless widows and orphans, who have been deprived by this terrible war of their natural providers, their husbands, sons and brothers having perished in the struggle. In France, Belgium, Germany, Austria, England, Servia, Russia and other countries there is an immense number of these unfortunates, for whom no appeal has been made from any source whatsoever. Aid is being rendered to the soldiers on the field and in the hospital; but the beneficiaries thus helped may simply be put to the front to fight again, thus prolonging the struggle. But the case of the "Silent Sufferers"—the bereaved mothers and children whose homes are broken up by the war—is far more pitiable. Tens of thousands of them are left utterly helpless, while great numbers have been cast adrift on the world, shelterless and friendless.

Correspondents in their cable despatches give here and there a paragraph which reveals a glimpse of the dark drama of suffering and sorrow that is now being enacted in innumerable homes in Europe. Writing from the war zone in France, one correspondent says of the refugee host:

"I was in the midst of it and saw unforgettable scenes of the enormous tragedy. It was a flight of hundreds and thousands of families from St. Omer and Roubaix, Bethune, Douai, Valenciennes, and Arras, who were driven away from their northern homes. They are still being hunted by fear from place to place, where they can find no shelter and no permanent safety. The railways have been choked with them, and in these long fugitive trains, which pass through stations, there is no food or drink. The poor runaways, weary, filthy, and exhausted, spend long days and nights shunted onto side lines, while troop trains pass and pass, and are held up in towns where they can find no means of existence.

"Can one wonder that mothers rush from their houses and wander forth in a blind, unreasoning way to swell the panic tide of fugitives, homeless and without food, dropping here and there on the wayside in utter weariness?"

After the tide of war had swept past, this was the picture of the French frontier villages as the correspondent saw them: "It was almost possible to reach the French frontier, but the villages but lately populous and filled with panic are now half deserted and melancholy. The refugees pour aimlessly to the coast and back again."

Remember, these refugees are not soldiers, but the wives and children of men who have gone to the war, very many of them never to return. War is inexorable. It demands not only the life of its victim on the field, but too often it involves the desolation of his home, the breaking up of his little circle of dear ones, making them outcasts and wanderers. Surely the widows and the orphans—the "Silent Sufferers"—are the victims of the war most deserving of our sympathy.

A correspondent in Belgium describes his visit to a deserted town. There was a stream of refugees along the road, every face bespeaking fear and helplessness. Aged men and women were there, and many mothers, dragging or carrying their children with them. "A mother among the fugitives," he writes, "when miles on the way, suddenly remembered that in the terror and confusion of gathering her household together and snatching a few belongings, she had wholly forgotten her little infant sleeping in its cradle. She now thought of it as awakening and crying for companionship and food. She was forcibly restrained from returning to its

PROGRESS OF THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many year's standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; Contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

EVENTS of such importance have followed each other so swiftly during the past few days that it is really difficult to see where to begin. However, as we began with Belgium last week, it will be, perhaps, as good a solution as any other to observe that now established precedent.

The signs all point to an intention on the part of Germany to permanently annex this kingdom in the event that German arms are triumphant. She has appointed a permanent governor, and is sending civil officials of all kinds and classes to Brussels, and there setting up a complete government of the type which prevails in Alsace-Lorraine.

Preparations are, also, being made to take Antwerp, which is the only important point in Belgium which the Germans do not now hold. With which end in view troops and siege cannon are being assembled at a convenient point, from whence they will probably have been launched on Antwerp by the time these lines reach my readers.

Antwerp is a very strong place, and now contains practically all that is left of the Belgian regular army, and its reduction will probably take some time, even if the besiegers are not interfered with by the fleet of the Allies, which is quite possible, as there will be difficulty in preventing these ships coming up the river.

The queen and her children and many of the inhabitants have taken refuge in England.

At Ostend, the British landed a large force of marines, which has since been followed up, it is said, by a considerable force of troops. There has been some suggestion that this movement has been made with the intention of making this a base from which to launch a rear attack on the German line of battle in France.

The idea is good; but up to the present the Germans have not shown themselves entirely devoid of military instinct, and it is presumable that, if any such thing really threatened, they would take appropriate action to frustrate the movements.

A HALT ON THE MARCH TO THE FRONT

Belgium has appointed a delegation to visit the neutral nations of the world to complain of alleged atrocities on the part of the Germans. Of course, I do not pretend to know the facts in this particular case, nor of the German complaints against the Belgians, but I think it proper to call my readers' attention to the fact that like accusations are made in every war. I have before me as I write clippings from one of the best New York newspapers of September, October and November, 1870, bearing on the same subject. With the exception that the names of the places are different, one would think one was reading the items now daily appearing. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am defending no one of the combatants. I merely wish to suggest that a little conservatism in believing everything printed on this subject would be wise.

FRENCH INFANTRY ADVANCING TO ATTACK

France has called to the colors her last two lines of reserves, and also the recruits of the class of 1914. This latter expression means the young men, who in the natural course of events would have reported to the colors towards the end of October, this year. The effect of these two calls is that every able-bodied male, from 19 to 52, is now incorporated in the army. These young men are, of course, without training and will not be a very valuable addition to her forces for at least four or five months. The two reserves will be used for garrison work, the guarding of bridges, etc., etc., and will release for the field an equivalent number of younger men. But now France has no further force of men to call up, she has reached her limit.

In England, Lord Kitchener has succeeded in raising the first 100,000 men called for, and the second 100,000 is nearly raised. These, too, will require several months' training before being fit to take the field. Lord Kitchener wishes to raise this force to 500,000 as rapidly as may be.

England is also bringing up native troops from her Indian forces to the extent, perhaps, of about 100,000 men. These are trained troops, and will be at once sent to the line of battle on their arrival in England. The first arrivals should be available during the next ten days.

The fighting between the invaders of France and her defenders has not been quite as heavy during the last few days as it was theretofore, but all through, it has been characterized by a slow but steady German advance. When my last article in this paper was published the line of battle ran roughly: Beginning at the extreme point of the Allies' left wing at Lille in northwestern France, thence in a curving line, first easterly to Givet, or thereabouts, thence again easterly, passing through Verdun and Toul to Belfort.

During the intervening time this line has been steadily forced back on the left wing and at the center till now the end of the left wing is well to the south of Amiens, and the center, having been beaten back through Mezières and Rethel, is endeavoring to hold itself at or near Rheims. From Rheims the line curves a little to the northward and reaches Toul and Verdun, whence following practically the same course as before, it reaches Belfort.

The Germans have attacked the eastwardly end of this line but little during the last few days, in fact the Allies on this end, for a day or two, assumed a feeble offensive, even advancing a little from Belfort into Alsace but without any final advantage.

The German plan of campaign is evidently t crumple the left wing of the Allies and to brea through their center, and to these two ends the have been devoting their greatest efforts.

In this plan there is a double advantage to them The English troops are in the left wing of th Allies, and the Germans recognize that the Englis constitute the backbone of the Allies' resistance. I they can capture or break the English oppositio the harder part of their task will have been accom plished, and hence they have been keeping up continual series of attacks on the English positio and subjected it to as hard hammering as an troops have probably ever been subjected to fo so long a time.

The English troops, while being forced to giv ground, have resisted this incessant pounding wit an endurance and tenacity worthy of the highes praise and admiration. Their losses have bee heavy, but their courage seems undiminished. Dur ing the week they have been reinforced, and will no doubt, continue to give a good account of them selves.

In addition to the frontal attack on the Englis position, the Germans are endeavoring to ge troops into position to launch a lateral attack o the extremity of the Allies' left wing. For this pur pose they are now concentrating troops to the south westward of Amiens. This movement is not ye fully developed, but when the shock comes fro both sides the left wing will have hard work t avoid being crumpled.

On the center, the German attack has also bee severe and incessant. Their object is, of course, t break through the center of the Allies' position, a by such a maneuver they would completely shatte the Allies' position. The Allies' left wing and cen ter would then be crushed by the German forces t the right and left and in front of them, while th easterly position of their line of battle, cut off fro its center, would be in great danger of a like fat at the hands of the German forces fronting them.

The French, seeing this danger, have brought u from their extreme right wing General Pa

ith his troops. Both the general and his troops ave easily proved the best fighting force the rench possess. The result is that the allied line as been greatly strengthened both in force and, hat is even more important, in morale, and is olding much better than it did before this reforcement arrived.

If the Allies can hold their army intact it is not eir plan to fall back on Paris. The mistake of oping a large force in a fortress to be starved out, nd to be useless while being starved out, will not e repeated. Paris will be defended by its own arrison of less mobile troops, and the more active my of the Allies, which is now on the line of ttle, will retreat southwards in the direction of rléans, Blois and Tours.

From such a position, using Paris as a pivot, they n still resume the offensive when opportune, in ny direction.

Paris is being rapidly put in condition to stand a ege. Houses interfering with the operations of e guns of the various forts have been razed, prosions and supplies of all kinds have been rushed , and the garrison reinforced, but, except as reards artillery, not with troops of the first line.

As many of the inhabitants as can are leaving e city, seeking refuge in the west and south.

The government of France has removed the capial of the country to Bordeaux, whither the presient, the ministry, the chambers, with the archives nd treasure, went late on August second. No omment on this action is necessary. It speaks for self loudly enough, in a language not to be misnderstood.

The last of the week was marked by a rather ensational capture by the Germans: the city of heims, which has always been considered one of e most important points, strategically considered, the middle east of France, and the key to all the orth and east of that country as well as of Paris, urrendered without a blow. London admits the act of the capture of the city. This surrender eems very strange. I am afraid that it is a parllel case with that of Lille.

The effect of this surrender of Rheims has been o bring about a change in the German plan of ampaign, to a considerable degree. At this writng, Sept. 7, it looks as though they had abanoned for the time being the attack on Paris, and ere moving in such fashion on the Allies' line of attle from the north and west as to attempt to rive them back towards the northeast of France, here three large German armies are apparently aiting for them. The effect of this movement ould be to force the Allies to a decisive battle ithout any such refuge as Paris to retreat to in ase of defeat. At the moment it is too early to ttempt to say how far this plan will be successful.

From the north we have at last some definite ews. I use the word "north" to designate the rontier of Russia with both Germany and Austria. t is not geographically correct, but it is convenient or the purpose of these articles.

The Russians have won a considerable victory at r near Lemberg, a few miles over the Austrian order, in Galicia. Here they have defeated an Austrian army of considerable strength, from two o three army corps, 90,000 to 125,000 men, with eavy loss, and driving them in disorder from their ositions have, it is said, occupied Lemberg, which n point of population, 200,000 circa, is the fifth or ixth city of Austria. In a strategic sense the victory is, however, hardly of the first importance. Lemberg leads to nowhere in particular, and invading the enemy's country, merely for the pleasure of invading it, without a definite strategic object, is not very apt to be a profitable undertaking in the long run. It sometimes results in having a large force cut off and falling a victim to the enemy.

THE REMNANT OF A HAPPY HOME

In the north we have a very different situation. Near Allenstein, in Eastern Prussia, Russia has met with one of the most colossal defeats of modern times. In fact, in open country, at this moment I do not recall any defeat which resulted in the enemy capturing a force equal to two whole army corps, 86,000 men, with their generals and staff and an entire park of artillery. Yet, by Russia's own confession, this has been what has happened.

When Bazaine was captured at Metz more men were taken, but this army was cooped up in a fortress, and when that became untenable, and the defending army was unable to break through the ring of besiegers, it could do nothing but yield. The present is, however, a totally different case.

The Russians had all of Russia to retreat in. The details of this extraordinary event are lacking, but the fact of the victory seems beyond doubt, inconceivable as it appears. I am frank to confess that such an occurrence is totally beyond my powers of comprehension.

WOUNDED SOLDIER BROUGHT IN BY COMRADE

The result is the more important so far in this war, important in itself, and important as regards its effects on the general situation.

As regards the Germans, it will ultimately have the effect of clearing East Prussia completely of the invader, and, more important than that, it will dispel the mystery of the unknown as regards the Russians from the minds of the German troops. The fear of the Cossacks, though sentimental, has been real among all classes of the German people, and now a few puffs of powder smoke, and it is dispelled.

The effect on the Allies, too, will be tremendous. They have been consoling themselves, over the situation in France, with the reflection that when the Russian colossus began to move in East Prussia, he would brush away all obstacles before him, and march triumphantly to Berlin.

Of course, Russia is not finished by this one defeat, but the defeat is so peculiar and so extraordinary that it seems an indication that the Russian army of today is in no way superior, in leadership or personnel, to the Russian army of the Russo-Japanese War, and if not, when opposed to troops of good quality, the result can be confidently predicted.

The Austrians and Germans claim that a joint army operating in Poland has captured Lodz, one of the most important manufacturing towns in Russian Poland, taking many prisoners, etc., and that this army is on the point of initiating a campaign against Warsaw from this point, from which it is about seventy-five miles southwest.

The name of St. Petersburg has been officially changed to Petrograd; Kronstadt and other towns in Russia, which were German in form, are also changed. This will cause considerable geographic confusion for some time. It would hardly seem a very dignified proceeding.

The question as to the number of troops Russia can equip and maintain in the field is a very vexed one. I am speaking of trained troops only; untrained troops would only be in the way in this conflict. After very careful consideration of all the authorities, and weighing of the probabilities, my personal opinion is that she cannot maintain in the field an army of more than 3,200,000. The stories running around in the press of ten, fifteen or twenty million are self-evident adsurdities.

Reports from the Balkans share with those from the north in conflictingness. Turkey has declared war on Russia, according to one account, on Greece, according to another, and finally, a third says, on England. That she will declare war is no doubt true, that she hates all three countries mentioned is equally true, the puzzle is which will be favored by her declaration. Most probably, England.

She cannot get at Russia unless allied to Rumania. She is playing for bigger stakes than Greece. She wants no allies for a reason hereafter referred to, so it is probably England against whom she will move. Bulgaria, though not an ally, will probably move in concert with her. The reason Turkey wants no allies is probably because it is on her books to declare a holy war, and this would not be easy if she had Christian allies.

This declaration would set a large portion, but not all, of the Mohammedan world on fire and would probably prove a considerable source of trouble to England in Egypt, and to Russia in the southern part of her Asiatic possessions. The Jehad, or holy war, has not been proclaimed for so long that its effect is rather doubtful, particularly as some Mohammedans do not recognize the Sultan as the true Califa; the Moors, for instance, do not.

rescue, an impossible task, and was compelled to hurry on, forever to be haunted by the vision of her deserted babe.

These conditions are duplicated in every country in Europe in which war is now raging. In the rural districts from which all able-bodied men have been drawn for service, there is a great, blind fear possessing the people, driving them from their homes. In scores of towns and villages across which the war has swept, the once happy homes are masses of blackened ruins. Weeping women and little children, smitten with a fear they cannot understand, are everywhere.

Even in Germany, the suffering among mothers and children is making itself keenly felt. In the Dorotheen Strasse in Berlin, where a general information bureau has been opened, all day long wives are calling inquiring concerning the fate of their husbands. Piteous scenes are witnessed hourly, and the Dorotheen Strasse is now called the "Valley of Tears."

Responding to a general desire on the part of its readers, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has opened a War Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the European War. Efficient relief committees at different centers in the various countries will have charge of the work of distribution. It is confidently hoped that not only the readers of this journal, but God's people everywhere throughout the United States, will aid this effort in behalf of the "Silent Sufferers" of the war by sending in their contributions to the fund with liberality and promptness. All contributions will be acknowledged. It is particularly desirable that the relief work should be opened without loss of time.

As in former relief work, our State Department in Washington will be requested to forward all remittances from the fund to the relief committees in Europe.

As the work advances, and as soon as full communication is re-established, the details of its operation, including the labors of the committees in the various fields, will be published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

This is a benevolent campaign in which all classes of Americans, regardless of race or religious denomination, may unite. Contributions to the fund may be designated for certain countries, or may be applied to the General Fund, according to the desire of the donor. Churches, Sunday schools, Bible classes, Young People's Associations, Ladies' Aid Societies, Mothers' Clubs, Peace Societies, and similar organizations are all invited to have a share in this relief movement in behalf of the widows and orphans of the war.

The following contributions to the War Relief Fund are acknowledged:

GOD'S IDEAL FOR US AND WHY WE MISS IT

*A SERMON BY REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine."
Luke 15: 31

THE lighthouse-keepers will never know how many eyes are turned to the lamps which they keep trimmed through the long night-watch; and no tongue can tell how many myriads have turned their eyes to this parable for the help that it gives. In how many prisons, infirmaries, mission meetings and gatherings of the forlorn and outcast have not these words been read! But, after all, the main object of the parable, as is apparent in the opening verses of the chapter, was not to encourage publicans and sinners to come—for they had already drawn near to hear the words of Jesus—but to answer the Pharisees and scribes who stood outside murmuring and ill at ease. This story was a mirror held up before their own characters, with the view of redeeming them.

As we study the story of the elder brother, we shall learn lessons which will be of lasting value and warning, because his spirit of Pharisaism still stalks along the aisles of our churches, and looms in the background of our board-rooms.

God's Children

GOD'S IDEAL FOR HIS CHILDREN. COMMUNITY OF NATURE. "Son!" This word, if the original were rendered exactly, means child of my own nature, or child of my heart. The father might have used another word, designating the grown son, but he chooses a nearer, dearer, tenderer word, which accentuates the community of nature binding each to other. The same word is used by John, in the prologue to his Gospel, of those who believe in Christ, and to whom the right is given to call themselves "children of God." (John 1: 12; Rom. 8: 17.)

In this connection, also, we recall the words of Peter, where, in the opening of his Second Epistle, he describes believers in Christ as partakers of the divine nature. Is not this the true line of approach to the heart of man? It is of comparatively little use to lash men with the scorpion-whips of remorse. Already they have suffered keenly. Perhaps their worst enemy would be satisfied, if only he knew all. It is surely wise to remind them of their marvelous possibilities, and tell them that the soil which has once come under the touch of God is full of flower and fruit seed, though heavily overgown with weeds. It is a glad message to give—"The nature of God is within you: make much of it;" or better, "Let the God-nature—the divine seed—have the fullest opportunity to work out its furthest possibilities in your life." "Rise up, O well!" It was in this strain that the father addressed the elder brother.

God's Sympathy

COMMUNITY OF INTEREST. "Thou art ever with me." This implies more than proximity of position, though that is included; for, as we are all aware, God is always within whisper-distance. But the word implies fellowship and going shares. "Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ." God expects us, as his children, to share his views of things, his love for the world, his joy in the return of his prodigals. The Authorized Version is right in translating the following words: "It was meet that we should make merry and be glad." Though it is not actually so in the Greek, it is clearly implied. We are told in the preceding parables that there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. If the angels rejoice, surely the least thing that the heavenly Father can expect of us, his children, is that we also should rejoice. But, do we? Frankly, do we share God's yearning sympathy for sinful men? Too often we stand on the beach watching the launching of the life-boat on the foam-crested billows, but we are apathetic in our interest, and get home to our beds, instead of waiting through the storm to greet the rescuers and rescued, and help to chafe the frozen limbs to life. How far short we fall of God's ideal!

"All Mine Are Thine"

COMMUNITY OF POSSESSION. "All mine is thine." In his High Priestly prayer our Lord said: "All thine is mine." Here the words are reversed and the Father addresses each child of his, saying: "All mine is thine." The contrast is very striking and significant. The elder son had complained that the father had never given him a kid. "A kid!" said his father. "My son, do you not realize that all I have is yours? I always thought that you would take whatever you needed to complete your happiness. It never occurred to me that you considered it necessary to wait till I gave." Is not this the source of the failure of our religious life? We pray, wrestle, and entreat, but we fail to take. God puts signed checks into our hands, but we do not present them for payment. He makes all grace to abound, but we ignore his offer, living in penury, when the unsearchable riches of Christ await our appropriation.

When the prodigal came back to the father, he said: "Father, I have sinned." The literal meaning of that confession is: "Father, I have missed the mark." Certainly he had done so. He had left the ancestral home with his quiver full of arrows. But they had all miscarried. Either they had fallen short, or had missed the target of happiness. But may we not all join in the same sad confession? Have we not all missed the mark? Have we not failed to realize these three outstanding possibilities? Objectively, and in the Father's ideal, it may be true that we are ever with him, and all that he has is ours, but practically, how far away and mystical these statements appear contrasted with our ordinary experience.

Stirrings of Selfishness

THE CAUSE OF FAILURE. Curiously enough, at the root, it was not unlike that which had lain beneath the bitter experiences of his younger brother! What was his mistake? That he struck out the spiritual side of his nature, and gave himself over to animalism. He threw the reins on the back of his passions, and bade them take him where they might. There is only one end to a career of that sort! It must end in bankruptcy. Every act of indulgence sows the craving for more, and always more. It is like a wrecked crew drinking salt water! One by one, they go mad!

He wanted "the goods" apart from the father. There was no harm in his having the goods, but he desired to enjoy them in the far country. Let it be clearly understood that God gives us all things richly to enjoy. Whatever is good in art, in science, in the study and love of nature, is not only permissible but even expedient for the children of the Creator, who thinks in terms of beauty, order and joy; the one condition always being that his gifts are enjoyed in fellowship with him, beneath his smile, and with the recognition that they have come from the hand of "the Father of lights."

But the elder brother made the same mistake, though he had narrower views than his brother. He only wanted a kid, but the kid was to be eaten apart from the father, with his own coterie of friends. The party was to be absolutely select, with the father omitted. He didn't ask for his portion of the goods or the fatted calf. It was enough for him to have a kid to make merry with his friends.

Let us study this case further! The elder brother had always maintained a high ethical standard in his personal character and behavior. So far as outward conduct went, he could challenge the closest inspection. Every one who knew him, to the household servants that came and went at his call, respected him and contrasted him with his brother. He had never at any time transgressed his father's wishes or commands. The most careful parent in his neighborhood would have been glad to entrust his daughter to his care, had he asked her hand in marriage. In fact, for many years, even from boyhood, he maintained this unblemished record. Besides, he had given himself up to the family estate and interests with painstaking industry.

Yet, in reality, he was as much separated from his father as the younger man. The separation was not obvious to the general view, but it was real and serious. He had never gone, or proposed to go, into a far country; but he had "the far country" in his heart. It is clear that there was a circle in which he was more really at his ease than he was in his father's presence, and this ha been rankling in his heart, beneath his urbane ai respectful exterior. He had interests and int macies, secret desires and cravings, altogeth apart from his father and the old home. He was the rift within the lute, which had been wide ing for some time, and was threatening to silen the harmony and music of his life!

He was an outsider, out of sympathy with th music which was ringing through the home. He wa blind to the relationship which should have bou him to his father and brother. To the one, he wa as a wage-earning servant; to the other he wa not related. His sin had broken the love-tie. "Th thy son is come."

He was blind to the tenure of the property. seemed to him that it rested on the basis of servic Whatever was received was earned by the swea of his brow, which was ill-requited at the best. never occurred to him that the father had divide unto them his living, and that all the remainde was as much his as the squandered half had been h brother's.

In his heart of hearts this elder brother kne that the father was right, knew that the happ festivity of the banquet was legitimate, knew th the brother who had gone astray and had returne needed the assurance of the welcome that he wa having; knew that his place was with him ar the father in the banqueting-hall. His conscien told him that he was wrong to be sulking outsid his heart in a ferment of jealousy, envy, hatre malice, and all uncharitableness. But he nurse an obdurate resistance to the warm, sweeter, holi law that surrounded him, as the flowers of summe will gather around an old upstanding rock juttin up in a garden, and resenting the soft, sweet spray of flowering shrubs that endeavor to cast the spells about it.

It becomes us to search ourselves in the light o these words. Our Lord meant that we should The publicans and sinners had drawn nigh to hea him, and the Pharisees and Scribes murmured. Bu their murmuring proved that outwardly they we equally estranged from God as the young prodiga of their age. We are decorous and painstaking religious matters. But are we sure that we have n imaginary circle of friends and delights that a outside God's will and nature? Are we quite su that our criticism of certain men, movements, an methods is not due to the low state of our ow spiritual experience? Are we quite sure that the is no spiritual dissonance between ourselves and th redeeming Spirit of Jesus? Why do we refuse take a share in certain great evangelical mov ments which are bringing multitudes of publica and sinners into the kingdom? Perhaps we can a duce reasons which are perfectly justifiable; b let us take care lest our adverse criticism and a stinence may not have a deeper origin, and spri from spiritual defect, and a want of sympathy wi the love of God, which must be in turn attributed the secret and almost imperceptible departure o our hearts from the living God.

High Ideals of Life

THE FATHER'S STRENUOUS EFFORTS TO RECLAI HIS SON. "Therefore came his father out, an entreated him." The word is that used in II Cor. —"As though God did beseech you by us, we pra you." The appeal which we are wont to make to pu licans and sinners, is here made to the righteou who, outwardly at least, have not gone astray. Th prodigal came back to the father; but here th father takes the initiative and goes out to his r calcitrant son. It is as though our Lord felt th it was easier to reinstate the prodigal, who ha come to the end of his resources, and was sic footsore, and sad, than to turn back the religiou professor who was self-satisfied with his recor confident of his honesty, and proudly contemptuou of the welcome extended to the wastrel.

Apparently our heavenly Father has keen sym pathy with the soul that has caught sight of higher ideal of life than it has hitherto realize rising as a higher cliff than any it has mastere He knows how sick the heart feels to learn th it must gird itself to a new effort. But there no other way of progress, except by the gradu

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, September 20. John 6: 53-58. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father: so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: he that eateth of this bread shall live forever." Eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ throughout this discourse refers to the believing appropriation of the work of Christ by a penitent sinner. It cannot refer to the sacramental eating and drinking of the body and blood of Christ in the Lord's Supper. For that sacrament was instituted later, in remembrance of the sacrificial death of Christ, for a confirmation of the faith of those who have accepted Christ, and are able to examine themselves. The eating and drinking in the Lord's Supper may also be for condemnation, if the communicant eats and drinks unworthily. But the eating and drinking of which the Lord speaks in this text is an indispensable requisite for salvation, and is always for life, never for death. This spiritual eating and drinking is effected by the mind, the soul, the spirit in us which lays hold of the entire Christ, and of all his vicarious acts and sufferings, and enters into that mysterious union with God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost which makes the believer a living temple of God, and the Christ the life-element, in which the believer as such lives, and moves, and has his being. This union which faith establishes outlasts death and physical decay. Its consummation is in the union everlasting and in never-ending life.

MONDAY, September 21. John 6: 61, 62. "Doth this offend you? What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before?" We come now to the sad ending of this illustrious discourse on the Bread of life. There is murmuring among the disciples. "Who can listen to such talk as this?" some of them are saying. Their impatience may have expressed itself in gestures of disapproval. Yes, the Gospel of the Godman who becomes a sin-offering for the world and offers himself as soul-food to men is an offense, a stumbling-block to men. Men's reason and self-respect rebel against this teaching. At the time when Christ spoke this discourse, some of the things he mentioned were yet to be accomplished. His divine-human personality indeed was a fact even then; sacrificial work was going on even then. But the consummation of all labors would not be reached until he rose from the dead and returned into that life out of which he had come. If they are shocked now at his teaching, what will they say to the corroboration of his teaching by his resurrection and ascension? For in him and with him, humanity entered into just such mysterious union and fellowship with God as that of which he had spoken in this discourse. And this mighty Conqueror of sin, death, and hell surely can establish a connection with believing hearts to the end of the world. We accept his "hard saying" on his authority. Christ stands accredited to us by the majesty of his teaching and the glory of his ministry, as the incarnate Son of God who loved us and gave himself for us. By him we live our present and with him we shall live our future life.

TUESDAY, September 22. John 6: 63, 64. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life. But there are some of you that believe not." To understand these words aright, we must remember that the Lord is still speaking to his offended disciples, whose fleshly or creature thoughts had just cropped out in their murmuring. It is the disciples' carnal way of approaching the deep subject he has laid before them that Christ here rejects. He tells them, in effect: "For such a spiritual matter there must be a spiritual receptacle." The reason of the flesh will never apprehend it. Man dead in trespasses and sins must be quickened into a new spiritual life, before that which his carnal mind considers offensive can appear the highest wisdom and the most blessed comfort to him. These profound matters relating to the wonderful personality and work of Christ are only grasped by believers, and their faith comes out of and rests on the very words which reveal these matters. It is as though he had said: "These words are spirit and life, the power of God unto salvation. It is not because I have not made my teaching sufficiently plain to you, but because you will not mortify your fleshly reason and will not believe me, that you are offended."

WEDNESDAY, September 23. John 6: 65. "Therefore said I unto you, that no man can come unto me, except it were given unto him of my Father." The Lord here reverts to a thought which he had expressed in the beginning of his remarks. He will not be dismayed by his failure to bring his hearers over to his view. Faith in his teaching is a gift of the Father. As Luther has said: "Faith is a divine work in us, which changes and creates us anew, and makes us entirely different persons in heart, mind, and affections." God who offers his Son as food for the souls of men must also create the desire for this food in men. No man is naturally receptive to the offer of divine grace. He receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned. It is through the drawing of the Father, who approaches the dead heart of man by the working of his mighty power in the Gospel—though he never coerces man by his irresistible omnipotence—that men are made eager to receive the flesh and blood of Christ; that is, to believe that Christ is their ransom. How greatly should we prize this divinely wrought faith, and how earnestly should we ask the Father to give it to those who are still without it, in order that our Lord may come into the full possession of his inheritance of redeemed souls!

THURSDAY, September 24. John 6: 67. "Will ye also go away?" The offense which some of his followers had taken at the Lord's remarks about the eating of his flesh took on a material form: they renounced their fellowship with him. When this defection had occurred, the eye of Christ rested pensively on that select band who were immediate associates in his ministry, the twelve, and he utters the ominous question we have quoted above. The question assumes the possibility, though it does not suggest the probability, of their deserting him. Yes, it is always possible for a believer to become a doubter and unbeliever, and any believer will unfailingly lose his faith, the moment he lets go of the sayings of Christ. He is set adrift on the wide sea of speculation and is irrevocably driven upon the reefs of skepticism and infidelity, as soon as his faith loses its anchorage in the words of Jesus. "Will ye also go away?" Warningly this word looks at us out of John 6: 67. Does it carry an accusation against you, dear reader? Have you slipped your anchor? Are you tossed with the tempest of doubt? Get back to the Rock of Ages; moor your boat again in its sheltering clefts.

FRIDAY, September 25. John 6: 70. "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" The sad question of Christ had drawn from the disciples a loyal declaration of unwavering allegiance. Peter voiced not only the sentiments of the twelve to whom the Lord had addressed his question, but of all believers to the end of time, when he uttered those memorable words: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." And now comes this heart-rending cry of Christ in answer to Peter's confession. He sees Judas among the rest; he has noticed his seeming acquiescence in Peter's words, but he reads this traitor's heart. He knows that the leaven of apostasy is working in him. Judas is a devil. The effect of this sudden remark must have been terrible. With this remark the Lord reinforces and justifies his question: "Will ye also go away?" But if Jesus knew the character of Judas why did he choose him for a disciple, and why did he retain him after this statement? It may have been to give us an illustration of the unwearying patience with which divine mercy seeks to reclaim even a brazen hypocrite. Judas is a monument to the Saviour's matchless long-suffering. No reprobate shall be able to charge Jesus with having abandoned him.

SATURDAY, September 26. Mark 7: 6-8. "Well hath Esaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things ye do." Pharisees have come up from Jerusalem. They are watching Jesus and his disciples. Very soon they have found something to charge the Lord with: the disciples do not wash their hands before they eat. These lynx-eyed heresy-hunters must have been very close observers of the habits of the disciples, and must have penetrated into the privacy of the life of Jesus' companions, for their charge is directed against something that the disciples are doing habitually. Jesus had not insisted on these ceremonial washings, and now the scrupulous guardians and champions of the letter of the law demand to know the reason why. Our text gives it. With undisguised contempt, the Lord meets this exhibition of religious zeal. He tells the Pharisees that they are not defending God's law but the commandments of men. God had never taught his people to believe and do what the Pharisees were teaching. Rather God seven hundred years before had warned the people against their teaching. For Isaiah's characterization of the hypocritical lip-worship of men whose heart is void of all fear and reverence of God, is an excellent portraiture of Pharisaism in the days of Jesus. Remember, these words were spoken by the same Jesus who has expressed his profoundest respect for the least tittle of the law. What God has spoken let us reverence and hold very sacred indeed; what men pretend to teach and ordain in the affairs of religion, let us reject with a hearty scorn.

unveiling of these successive levels. The sharp pang of remorse at the contrast between the towering heights and present attainment, is an inevitable experience to the growth of character. These are birth-pangs and not death-throes. So the Father comes out to help us. The question is whether we will accept his invitation, and in company with him, enter the festal throng. It will need the humbling of the soul and the confession of penitence. The doorway is narrow and the lowness of the entrance compels us to stoop, but it will conduct us into a larger and fairer room than any we have occupied.

The soul must make its choice. Did the elder brother accept the proffered help and enter the banqueting-hall? Our Lord does not say. He leaves it for each of us to answer that question by our own behavior and experience. Be it remembered, however, that the Father comes out that we may go in, and that the grace of God waits to assist us in this new stage in the soul's ascent. Perhaps the first step will be to lead us to find out our brother, confess to him our want of sympathy, and embrace him as the father did. Immediately after which we shall find ourselves in a new mansion of our Father's home.

LIVING WATER IN ASHOKAN CAMP

THAT day when he responded to a summons to "Brown Station," the writer was somehow like one who, in ages past, "went out, not knowing whither he went." The census had given the population as a hundred and a quarter. Who from this would anticipate a thrifty community of a few thousand people?

Nor did the transfer from train to auto and the trip over virgin dirt road through woods and across a stumpy wilderness, give much enlightenment relative to the destination. Climbing a steep grade and circling a small hill, we turned into a road marked "Private," leading past long rows of bungalows, beyond which stood a large yellow structure having the appearance of a hotel. It was while mounting the steps of this building that light dawned. The building was the main office of Winston & Co., Contractors. A room inside held a map whereon were the words "Ashokan Dam, Brown Station." This was our induction to one of the largest construction camps in the country.

The damming of the great Ashokan Reservoir, having a shore line of approximately forty miles, has involved eliminating half a dozen villages and scores of farms, building five and a half miles of concrete dams and dikes, erecting a popular driveway of nearly fifty miles of new State highways, and relocating some fourteen miles of the Ulster and Delaware Railroad from the reservoir basin to the latter's northern shore line. Here in this great irregular, boot-shaped trough, a hundred and thirty billion gallons of water from the Catskill watersheds will be stored for conveyance through a hundred-mile aqueduct to New York City. The ultimate cost will reach far into the millions. Two years may yet be consumed in completing the huge system. An army of laborers is encamped in these Catskill footlands of Ulster County. Here, until 1907, a hundred and fifty farming people peacefully dwelt in the quiet community of Brown's Station on the Ulster and Delaware road, fourteen miles from Kingston. To-day that railroad is four miles distant, the farmers departed and their homes destroyed. Something remains of this modern Grand Pré, however. To-day we behold a few hundred bungalows that sprang up like mushrooms in a night, in a charming chestnut, pine and laurel grove. Can you imagine a thoroughly equipped and provisioned city built for a day? Such is the Winston Camp, homeing between three and four thousand temporary residents. These all find their livelihood in this one stupendous enterprise. The central streets are the American residential section, the foreigners living in surrounding exterior sections. In the latter are found Italians and negroes in abundance, also Swedes, Hungarians, Austrians, Russians, Germans, Slavs, Poles, and Spaniards, and their children.

TRANSFORMING A FARMING SECTION INTO A VAST INLAND LAKE OF DRINKING WATER

A construction camp usually has problems of a purely local nature. Where unlearned foreigners are gathered in numbers, there is disorder. It would appear to the honest observer that a minimum of such chaos exists here. In the first place, the entire area of some thirty square miles of the city's property, of which the camp occupies an insignificant section, is patrolled by the Board of Water Supply mounted police. A part of their barracks are situated on the outskirts of the camp. While these men patrol all property belonging to the city, the immediate peace of the camp is under Winston's private police. "In five years," said the chief of the camp patrol, "there have been no murders or assaults resulting in death. Moreover, of the eight to ten thousand foreigners who have inhabited the camp during these years, not one has been accused of even insulting women. The shameful truth remains that we can not speak so favorably of our American camp-dwellers. The large majority of cases which we have tried have been for petit larceny, such as check-raising.

"It is my experience," he continued, "that ninety per cent. of the trouble noticed among working people generally is caused by drink. That is why we fight such importation as heavy drinks concealed in suitcases." Sanitation in the Ashokan camp is assiduously maintained. All houses enjoy running spring water and have pipe connections with the private sanitation plant which cares for all sewage. The company has scavengers who daily care for garbage, as in first-class cities. Campers are permitted to keep dogs and chickens, under enforced restrictions. The pig, fond pet of the outer camp, is anathematized. Most of the people have small gardens. The soil is rich. Always it is the foreigner who excels in this intensive cultivation. It is the writer's great pleasure to stroll through our "Little Italy" section, and enjoy the cheery adaptation of wild local plants and vines to the simple homes. For the Italian is a lover of plants and shrubbery. The approach to many of their bungalows lies through a shady arbor of wild cucumber or ivy—reminders, they tell us, of the grape arbors of the motherland.

CROSS SECTION OF AQUEDUCT

The large number of young people whose parents follow the contractor's camp for their livelihood created one problem. The camp boasts of three well equipped schools—two American and one foreign. The latter, situated in the foreign section, is attended exclusively by the children of foreign parentage. One factor of great moral and civic good to the local foreign community—as well as to the nation—is the night school work of the Italian Immigration Society of New York City. From thirty to sixty hard-working men come together five evenings each week to study the English language, read and write simple lessons in civic duty, and do problems in arithmetic. The camp has a theater, where moving pictures are exhibited six nights a week. None is barred on account of race or color. Without question the moral tone of the camp is elevated by the presence of Christian people and people with religious sentiments. The company provided a building for the colored people in which they have held services. In the summer of 1913 some loyal Christian people, dissatisfied with the irreligious spirit and careless observance of Lord's Day in camp, came under the influence of Rev. Richard Braunstein, pastor of Olivebridge Methodist Church. With great eagerness he lent himself to the spiritual upbuilding of the community. His enthusiasm was undaunted by lack of a suitable church edifice. Regular Lord's Day services were begun in the auditorium of the foreign school building. Many good people, unaware of the quality of these services, refused to attend. Late in the fall the theater managers loaned that building for worship. Since then it has served the purpose most acceptably.

Pastor Braunstein is a young man of scholarly attainments. He preaches straight from the shoulder, and aims to win men and women to the best life. This fact is partially realized by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers from his sermons published in these columns. All denominations are united in the fervor of the pastor's Gospel message. To the credit of some parents, private Sunday classes had been conducted for children of Christian homes through the years past. This was felt to be insufficient. Under the pastor's influence, a union Sunday school was organized. Thirty eager scholars reported the first day. On the fourth successive Sunday memberships and offerings had exactly doubled. Every denomination in camp, not excluding our Catholic brethren, are represented in this school.

The one essential is that those who teach do believe the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and are consecrated to impart its pure and simple truths. And this is done "that they all may be one," "that the world may believe." Thus human and eternal interests of individuals have their place in a gigantic enterprise for a cosmopolitan city 120 straight miles away. Greater New York can receive 500,000,000 gallons daily, in addition to its Croton supply, from this vast Ashokan reservoir, whose waters, by a three days' journey through 156 miles of winding aqueduct, will race as needed through millions of faucets.

A STREET IN THE ITALIAN QUARTER AT BROWN STATION

LOOKING UPSTREAM BEFORE THE WATERS WERE SHUT IN

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

CONGRESS TO STAND BY. It appears probable that Congress may continue in session during the critical stages of the war in Europe, adjourning only for brief intervals, and even then subject to the call of the President, in order to be able to act promptly in any emergency that may arise, particularly in regard to the business and financial interests of the country. The President has returned to Washington from his vacation, and the country has the satisfaction of knowing that the machinery of national government will be in constant readiness throughout this world crisis.

INCREASING THE CONDUCTOR'S BURDEN. Conductors on passenger trains of the Pennsylvania, after October 1 must compute fares paid by mileage book coupons at two and a quarter cents a mile, instead of at the even sum of two cents as at present. As it is "promised" that other passenger rates will be similarly affected by the needs of the railroad, the lot of the passenger conductor will soon cease to be the sinecure it now is. Nor will there be an exodus from the Pennsylvania to other lines to escape this mental tax, for it is also "promised" the pleased public that other lines will doubtless raise passenger rates. A long period of unchanged rates, during which immense sums have been expended in traffic improvements, is urged in extenuation. It is stated that the railroads of the country must either pay at maturity or reborrow the par value of over $500,000,000 of securities falling due within the next two years.

KING COTTON PUTTING ON WEIGHT. The government's latest condition report on the cotton crop estimates a yield 8 per cent. of normal; the ten-year August 25 average is 73.4 per cent. Favorable weather has improved the crop to bumper size, 15,000,000 five-hundred-pound bales now being prophesied. The 1911 record crop was 16,100,000 bales.

MUTTERINGS OF HOME RULE. On August 31 Premier Asquith announced in the House of Commons that when the House reassembled September 9 the government would take up the Irish Home Rule bill and the Welsh Disestablishment measure. Immediately there was stern objection to consideration of Home Rule while members were absent at the front, by ex-Premier Balfour, supported by the Nationalists, the Ministerialists angrily opposing his stand. The sudden storm, quickly over, served to warn the country that the domestic hatchet has not been buried as supposed while England wields the battle-ax afar.

WASHINGTON MARINERS AT LOGGERHEADS. The Naval Committee of the House is said to contemplate recommending to the President a measure for the immediate expansion of our merchant marine that will embody his ideas, divested, however, of what is considered by some to be a dangerous principle to apply in the present emergency, viz.: government ownership. The President appears determined to secure the consent of Congress to the establishment of a governmental line of freight and passenger steamships in order to take care of our accumulating crop exports. He is said to intend to suspend, for possibly three years, the requirement that vessels flying the American flag shall have American mates and masters, being assured that some 200 foreign-owned vessels will at once take out American registry in consequence. The Senate has already passed Senator Weeks's bill authorizing the use of certain naval cruisers for commercial purposes; but fears of international complications if government-owned vessels carry supplies to Europe prompt opposition to the President's program.

IN PEACE-RIDDEN MEXICO. Disquieting news is mingled with optimistic reports that come out of Mexico. Although Provisional President General Carranza is preparing to substitute an out-and-out civil government for the military rule that now prevails, and the threatened breach between himself and General Villa seems to have been healed, accounts of movements by ex-Federals to oppose the new régime are received by way of Vera Cruz. General Aguilar has issued a proclamation, it is said, calling upon ex-Federals in the South to join him against Carranza. Animus against the United States is present in the embryonic new revolution. On September 3 the United States battleship Virginia left Guantanamo for Vera Cruz. By a decree of the present government, that port has been closed to Mexican shipping because of its occupation by forces of the United States while no state of war exists between the two countries.

ONE KING RETIRES. The Mussulmans of Albania pursue the even tenor of their domestic revolution regardless of the confusion in the world outside, Prince William of Wied, the monarch foisted upon them by Europe and their chief undesirable citizen, having finally deserted the kingdom, the capital, Durazzo, being under heavy bombardment.

ELECTION OF NEW POPE. The College of Cardinals, which met in secret conclave at the Vatican, August 31, to elect a successor to Pope Pius X, who died August 20, after many ballots chose Cardinal della Chiesa, September 3, who will assume the title of Benedict XV. Cardinal Giacomo della Chiesa was born at Pigli, Italy, in 1854, and being now just under sixty years of age is one of the youngest Popes ever elected. He was made priest in 1878, and has filled several important positions in the church, becoming Cardinal only last May while Archbishop of Bologna. The only American cardinal present at the conclave was Cardinal Farley of New York, Cardinals O'Connell of Boston and Gibbons of Baltimore being delayed en route.

STRAYED WAR ITEMS. The United States ambassador to France, Myron T. Herrick, is the sole remaining foreign minister in Paris, all others having accompanied the government to Bordeaux. All foreign embassies in Paris will be turned over to the United States representative by their respective governments, pending the return of the government to the capital.

It is now being proposed that the upper air be "mined" with small balloons equipped with explosives sufficient to wreck an aircraft coming in contact, and "barb-wired" by means of kites with wire tails for fouling the propellers of aircraft, and thus hurling them to earth.

The hosts of Americans stranded in Europe are being gradually thinned by those who manage to get aboard the few steamers which have sailed for America. Returning tourists bring little with them excepting experiences. One told of the occupation of Brussels by the Germans, 250,000 troops passing through the city in impressive fashion: "First six cyclists, then a detachment of cavalry, then a great mass of infantry, then field guns and more infantry, then huge howitzers, then a pontoon train, then more infantry: from 1.30 o'clock Thursday until Sunday morning without a break. Each company had a stove, the fire of which was never out; there was always some hot drink ready. The endless procession sang all sorts of songs in excellent tune; like everything else their singing is perfectly organized. An aeroplane kept ahead of the line, dropping variously colored stars as signals."

HIGH COST OF WARRING. A $100,000,000 war revenue must be provided for by Congress, and it is said that leaders are seriously considering the following sources among others: a tax upon theater tickets; upon street-car and railroad tickets; upon automobiles indirectly by taxing the gasoline, say two cents a gallon; upon sarsaparilla and similar beverages; upon tickets to baseball games. President Wilson addressed a joint session of Congress personally on the subject September 4.

SAVES BURNING EXCURSION BOAT. On September 1 a Lake Michigan excursion boat, the City of Chicago, with three hundred passengers aboard, caught fire only twelve miles from port, and her wireless failing to work, the destruction of the boat and loss of all on board was avoided by running full speed into the government breakwater off Chicago. Fire tugs and others had put out from shore as soon as the burning boat was sighted, and the passengers and crew were removed to the breakwater and thence to shore. Captain Oscar Pjork is credited with the prompt action which saved the ship.

THE G. A. R. URGES MORAL UPLIFT. At the great encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic held at Detroit, prominent speakers discussed governmental laxity in providing for the spiritual welfare of enlisted men, and advocated that greater efforts be made by the Chaplains' Association of the G. A. R. to meet the situation through government bureaus.

SENATE PASSES CLAYTON TRUST BILL. The Senate has passed the Clayton Trust Bill much modified, after three months' consideration, the vote standing 46 to 16. The bill has wide scope in regulating the operations of trusts and preventing monopolies. It prohibits interlocking directorates where combinations in restraint of trade could result; forbids injunctions in labor disputes, excepting when irreparable injury to property is threatened; exempts labor organizations from prosecution under the trust laws as illegal combinations in restraint of trade; makes it unlawful to require the purchaser or lessee of a patented article to agree not to use in conjunction therewith articles or processes supplied by any other person. This bill completes the administration measures for the regulation of business, and if accepted and passed by the House will crown with success the President's program.

THE WAR AFFECTS PHILADELPHIA. The press of Philadelphia reports that Mayor Blankenburg intends urging a $15,000,000 loan for public improvements, in order chiefly to provide work this winter for the thousands who may be thrown out of employment by the continuance of the war, 70,000 men being now out of work in that city.

CLASH OF BUTTE LABOR UNIONS. The disaffection on the part of members of the Western Federation of Miners, which resulted in trouble and the formation of a rival organization, the Butte Mineworkers' Union has now brought about a state of local war, armed citizens protecting their stores and other property from looters, the new union, according to reports, seeking to coerce all miners into membership under threat of deportation, and virtually tying up enterprise meanwhile. August 30 the employing office of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company was destroyed with dynamite, and preparations were made by Governor Stewart to place Butte under military rule. The miners threaten to destroy the place utterly if State or Federal troops are brought there.

THE WAR AND FOREIGN MISSIONS

—As to the effects of the current war upon the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Dr. S. Earl Taylor, senior corresponding secretary of the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions, made this statement:

"Missionary work throughout the entire world is being affected by the war in Europe. The banking systems of the world are tied up, so it is almost impossible to send money or negotiate paper. Missionaries who had started on their way to the field are now delayed in England or at other points. Missionaries desiring to come home find it difficult to do so. Furlough periods will have to be readjusted. Mail systems are disorganized.

"We have extensive work in Bulgaria, Hungary, Austria, North and South Germany, Switzerland, France and Russia, all of which is directly embarrassed by present war conditions. The monthly remittances which we are accustomed to send to our workers in Europe cannot be forwarded. But even if the drafts were to reach their destination, doubtless many of our people would be on the way to the battlefield, and thus inaccessible. The South American countries most distressed by the cutting off of their intercourse with Europe are those on the east coast, Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina and Chile, which are the principal markets in South America, and which have the largest purchasing power."

—Dr. F. J. Clark, recording secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Episcopal Church, said: "Fortunately for the foreign missionary work of our church, we may say in general that the European War does not affect our work in any serious way, as none of our fields is in the actual radius of the conflict. Possibly portions of West Africa may be involved. Our chief difficulty is, like all other enterprises, the interruption of communication and rise in the price of exchange, and other indirect effects from which the whole world suffers. Word has just been received from the bishop in Shanghai to let the missionaries come forward."

—Dr. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, gave this statement: "In view of the Japanese ultimatum to Germany regarding Tsingtau and the resultant hostilities, the Board of Foreign Missions of our church has cabled to the Shantung Mission giving full discretion in taking such steps as may be necessary for protection of our missionaries and property at Tsingtau, and advising the withdrawal of the missionaries from the city. We have also sent the Secretary of State in Washington information regarding our missionaries and property in Tsingtau, and asked the protection of our government.

"Serious difficulty has developed in supplying our missions with funds, particularly in fields like India, Syria, and Persia, to whom the board has been accustomed to send money through its London bankers. A cable from India stated that the rates there were prohibitive, and asked for immediate advice. The American ambassador in Constantinople has cabled the Secretary of State: 'Impossible to realize funds on bills; send me through State Department, either for delivery at Constantinople or Smyrna for mission use, five thousand gold sovereigns; also ask Constantinople College trustees to send Kendall by some conveyance two thousand gold sovereigns.'

"The American Board, which has large work in Turkey, has received a cable to the same effect from its treasurer in Constantinople, and has asked us to unite in requesting our government to arrange for the forwarding of gold to give needed relief. After consultation with the Rev. D. Stuart Dodge, D.D., and Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge, representing the Boards of Trustees of the Syrian Protestant College in Beirut, and Robert College in Constantinople, our executive council telegraphed the American Board that it would join it in such a request, and that we held ourselves in readiness to transmit $10,000 for our Syrian Mission to the State Department."

—"Dr. J. L. Amerman, at the Department of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church, said: "Our work is not as yet at all affected by the war, as our missions are away from the war territory. But we are disturbed over the impossibility of sending money, and have instructed our missionaries to borrow money until we can get it to them. We have four mission stations in China, nine in Japan and five in Arabia."

—Dr. William B. Liphard of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, says: "We have thus far not been seriously affected by the European War situation. It is of course probable that our missionary work on the continent of Europe is more or less demoralized, since many of the members and also the pastors of our churches there may have been called into service. Regarding our missions in the Far East, we shall probably have difficulty in the transmission of funds. In case Japan carries on a prolonged war, our missionary work there will probably suffer as well as our work in China. We anticipate no difficulty whatever in Burma, Assam or India, nor have we any fears regarding our missionary work in the Philippines. From Africa has come the alarming news that the missions are facing a shortage of provisions, since most of the supplies are sent via Belgium and the present condition of that country makes any further shipments impossible."

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

A Call to Christian Service

THE greatest war the world has ever known is devastating Europe. Many thousands have already perished and thousands more are dying of their wounds. The Continent has become a great slaughter-house.

We in happy, peaceful, prosperous America have little comprehension of the frightful character of the suffering among the European peoples, caused by this overwhelming war. May we never have such an experience. And in remembering our blessings, we now have an opportunity of showing our gratitude to God for his goodness by reaching out hands of love and helpfulness to our brothers and sisters in distress.

We appeal in behalf of the Silent Sufferers of this greatest of all wars. We invoke your pity and your practical help, not for the soldiers in the field, nor for those in hospitals, where they are being patched up that they may fight again, but for the numberless widows and orphans in whose behalf no voice has yet been raised. They are, in a very real sense, the worst sufferers by the war. Today, they sit sad and helpless in their desolated homes, knowing that their dear ones will never cross the threshold again; but there are, alas! many more who have no roof to shelter them and who are friendless and forsaken, their little homes destroyed and all their worldly possessions, save what they can carry away in their hands, devoured by this insatiable war.

All through Belgium, France, and Germany, Russia, Austria and Servia, the war has left communities filled with these Silent Sufferers, whose fathers, brothers, husbands and sons will return no more. Who can adequately picture the miseries that have been wrought in the homes of the humble? Every day the cable brings stories of their wretchedness—women and little children and feeble old folks sitting amid the smoking embers of their dwellings, or tramping the country roads, terror-smitten, hungry, shelterless, sleeping in woods and hedges—waifs of the war.

Let us not only pray that God may comfort them, but let us do our share. If we have a spark of the spirit of Christ in us, we will gladly unite in helping these unfortunates. Never has there been such an opportunity for Christian service as that which is now before us. To help them is, indeed, a great enterprise, far greater than any the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family has ever undertaken in the past; but, under God, we will do what we can. We know our own people and we know that their great heart has never failed to respond to the call of humanity. What they did for India, Japan, Russia, Armenia, Italy, China, Finland and other nations in past years during times of distress, and how nobly they helped our own people in days of flood and epidemic, can never be forgotten. We feel assured they will not falter now, for this is a clear call to Christian service, which every true man and woman will deem it a duty and a privilege to obey.

Ours is an army equipped not with weapons that slay, but with help and blessing that give consolation and life. Over all floats the banner of Christ, and under that banner we will go forward to succor the distressed, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to shelter the wanderers, to comfort the sad-hearted and to bring what little we may of consolation to those who are the heaviest sufferers in this greatest of calamities.

In obedience to urgent demands from many quarters, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now organizing relief work for the widows and orphans of the war in Europe. Efficient committees will have charge of the work among the Silent Sufferers in the different countries. Every dime and every dollar contributed to the fund will be used undiminished for supplying food, shelter, clothing and other necessaries for these unfortunates. Let us, as the only great neutral Power at peace with all the world, make our neutrality mean something more than inaction and indifference. Let it mean beneficence, succor, rescue. We urge every one who reads this to have a personal share in this work. None can afford to be unrepresented. And in sending your gift, let it be accompanied by an earnest prayer that God in his great mercy will shorten Europe's time of trial and that enduring peace may follow.

Remember, too, that "He that gives quickly gives twice"; therefore, do not delay, but send in your contribution at once. All contributions should be addressed:

A Day of Prayer for Peace

THE following letter was received the other day at the CHRISTIAN HERALD office:

Considering the appalling features of the foreign war, I would like to suggest for your earnest consideration, as the head of a paper that has always been influential in materially blessing the peoples of afflicted countries, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should use its influence with our beloved and Christian President, Mr. Wilson, to appoint a day of prayer that the people of this nation may fall upon their knees and implore God to bring about peace in the Old World.

God answered our prayer for continued peace with Mexico, and our country's attitude would no doubt awaken the combatants to their error. EDWARD CLAYTON HARRIS.
Orange, N. J.

Before this letter had been brought to the editor's attention, the following telegram had already been sent to President Wilson:

Members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League are asking that prayer be made for the peace of Europe. All devout souls throughout America are praying that the war may be brief. The appointment by you of a national day of prayer for the speedy return of peace to war-torn Europe and a proclamation urging American churches and citizens to observe that day would give opportunity for concentration of this prayer impulse which is now wide-spread and intense. The United States occupies the unique position of being the greatest world-power now blessed with peace. It would be in every way fitting to our opportunity, our dignity, our neutrality to engage as a nation in concerted prayer for the speedy return of world-wide peace. May we urge you to make a proclamation calling the people of the United States to engage still more earnestly in prayer for peace and to unite on a stated day in special prayer to God that the present war which is bringing anguish and death to multitudes may come to a speedy end?
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

These are days when the people should be learning new secrets of prayer. Hearts turn to God with greater intensity than ever in the midst of the appalling news of bloody strife. It is our earnest hope that before this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appears the appointment of a National Day of Prayer for Peace in warring Europe will have been proclaimed.

The Immortal Name

TRAVELERS tell us that very little remains of the ancient cities of Asia Minor. Portions of the old walls may still be seen, and some fragments of buildings and here and there huge, square pillars with interspanning arches are pointed out as the ruins of some early Christian church. But no ruins even are left to mark the humble place of worship of that faithful little band to whom the Lord Jesus sent a letter by the hand of the Patmos exile, and no stone to show the spot where one of them was buried. They passed away and their memory perished from among men.

And truly, small need had they of monumental stone or brass who had heard this voice of their Lord: "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out, and I will write upon him the name of my God and the name of the City of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God, and I will write upon him my new name."

The tallest pillar on earth stands in the City of Washington. It bears no inscription—its sides are perfectly plain and smooth—but all over it from base to capstone, the inner eye of every true American can read the undying praises of "the father of his country." So the writing on the pillar in the heavenly temple will not be for mortal sight, but the spirit-eyes of the redeemed shall see it, and the height of the glory of it no thought can reach.

How much better to be a monument in heaven than to have a monument—even Washington's—on earth; to stand forever there in the shining courts, inscribed all over with the praises of the Redeemer's grace and glory, than to leave a name on the richest, loftiest marble beneath the sun. We shall all die and be forgotten. Some may be remembered a little longer than others, but neither the chisel of the sculptor nor the pen of the historian can avert the doom that comes at last to all—to be forgotten. And yet, every one of us may have an immortal name. If God knows us, he will not forget us. If by his grace we overcome, he will see to it that we have a name and a place forever. He will make us pillars in his temple.

Belittling Christianity

WE DO not encourage heresy-hunting in this age of free and uncontrolled discussion of the essentials of religion. At the same time we expect and demand loyalty on the part of those who profess the religion of Christ and especially those whose position and influence in the Christian organization are such as enable them to exert an important influence on others.

It follows logically that we should look well to the character of the instruction given in our theological seminaries. There the doctrine should be taught in its purity, else the stream will be poisoned at the source. In some of our seminaries it is known beyond question that error has crept in, and that the students, who are to be the pastors and missionaries of the future, have been indoctrinated with views which, if they took root, would disqualify them for the Christian ministry. The most recent case of this kind of teaching has just come to light, the alleged offender being Professor Lucius Hopkins Miller, associate professor of Biblical Instruction at Princeton, whose unbiblical utterances have been publicly challenged in a pamphlet written by Rev. Ford C. Ottman, leader of the Presbyterian Conference at Stony Brook, N. Y. Dr. Ottmann charges that Professor Miller, in his Bible teaching at Princeton, has expressed views that are diametrically opposed to certain essentials of the faith. As Princeton has always enjoyed the reputation of being stanchly orthodox, its defection is the more startling and has naturally caused surprise and indignation among loyal Presbyterians.

In a published statement of Professor Miller's views there is no recognition of the divine Sonship or the Saviour's great mission to redeem the world. It is studied depreciation, with doubt disclosing itself in every line. The "exalted personality" is a tribute which might be expected from a Buddhist or a Mohammedan, but coming from the lips of a professor in a Christian university, it is mockery and derision. Furthermore, where does the professor get his information that Jesus was born in Nazareth?

If the allegations brought by Dr. Ottman are sustained, it is evident that the professor is out of place in the chair of Biblical Instruction at Princeton or elsewhere. We should rejoice to hear that he has been misrepresented and is able to refute his accusers; but that is hardly probable. If he finds himself no longer loyal to Christ, the honorable way out is to retire and to take his strange doctrines to the public platform, where he can expound them to any audience that is willing to hear them.

Important Indian Convention

FROM October 6th to 11th, the Indians of the country will hold their fourth annual national conference at Madison, Wis. The Madison meeting will be under the jurisdiction of the Society of American Indians, a national organization of Indians and their friends. The Indians and their friends were invited to the University of Wisconsin through the interest of President Van Hise, the Wisconsin Archeological Society and the Board of Commerce. The program as announced will embrace many vital discussions, and the speakers will be men and women who have expert knowledge of Indian affairs as well as the principles of race development. The tenor of the Denver meeting may be known by a quotation from a former platform: "We realize that hand in hand with the demand for our rights must go an unwavering desire to take on new responsibility. We call upon our own people to lay hold of the duties that lie before them, to serve not only their own race, but to serve all mankind." The theme this year is, "To the American Indian let there be given equal opportunities, equal responsibilities and equal education." It is a pity that so noble a people so grievously treated, should have so few left to enjoy the blessings of our American civilization. The moral and religious equality of all races of mankind is thus taught by the apostle in his speech on Mars Hill:

And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth. (Acts 17: 26.)

Notable Hearse Driver

THOMAS McAULIFFE, the driver of New York City's hearse since 1887, died suddenly the other day. His records show that he carried to the morgue the bodies of 70,000 persons. As might be expected, one engaged in such a business could hardly be indifferent to the sufferings of others. The driver was very benevolent and aided the widows and children of those who had loved ones snatched from them by some tragedy or another. Having taken so many thousands of the bodies of others, some one had to carry his body to its resting-place, illustrating the great truth enunciated ages ago by Israel's royal preacher:

Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets. (Eccles. 12: 5.)

Girl Saves Uncle

MISS ALICE STEVENS, her uncle, Henry G. Stevens, and two girl friends were fishing from a motor launch outside of Huckleberry Island in their bathing suits. Mr. Stevens, who weighs nearly three hundred pounds, went for a swim and was seized with cramps and sank beneath the surface. Miss Stevens dived for her uncle, got him afloat and brought him back again to the launch. She administered artificial respiration, and after a half-hour's hard work, resuscitated him. These instances of heroism in every day life are very common and are beautiful in the extreme. They involve the risk of one's life in behalf of another and remind us of the apostle who said:

Neither count I my life dear unto me. (Acts 20: 24.)

Hotel Waiter's Pleasant Discovery

A PROSPEROUS resident of Victoria, B. C., was a guest at a hotel in New York City, and Hans Petersen, the chief waiter, took his order at dinner. Something in the guest's face called up the memory of boyhood days in Copenhagen, Denmark. He said: "Pardon me, sir, but are you not a Scandinavian?" "I am," was the reply; "I am from Denmark." "That was my country, too, sir," said Hans. "Were you any relation to the late Mayor Blom, who lived in Crown Prince Street, Copenhagen?" "He was my grandfather," was the reply. "And Mr. Ferdinand Blom was—" "My father. But, why do you ask?" "Sir, for two and a half years—before I entered the army—I was butler in the house of your grandfather. Your father was two years younger than I. He was a great friend of mine. It was your resemblance to him that made me speak to you. When your father went around the world in 1872, I was in New York, and I called to see him." Mr. Blom recalled hearing his father tell about his visit to New York, and about seeing Hans over there, and chatted for some time with the waiter. Then he took Hans up to his rooms to see the youngest Blom, who was born in Victoria. "Now," he said, "you have seen four generations of the family." While the guests were at the hotel, they were treated with special favor, and when they left, a large gold-piece was placed in the hand of the waiter with the promise that the father in Copenhagen would be written to about the incident. The knowledge of the family by the waiter to the fourth generation reminds us of what is said of Job:

And saw his sons, and his son's sons, even four generations. (Job 42: 16.)

PEACE PARADE OF WOMEN DRESSED IN MOURNING, PASSING PUBLIC LIBRARY

ON SATURDAY, August 29, with muffled drums, fifteen hundred women robed in black, marched down Fifth Avenue, New York City, from Fifty-eighth Street to Union Square, as a protest against the European War. There was now and then a man or woman who applauded, but the general silence of the procession was awful in its eloquence. The immense crowd lining the streets on either side witnessed the procession. Following the mounted police, Miss Alice Carpenter, with Miss Rose Young and Mrs. Florence Woolston as aides, bore the big peace flag, a large yellow-fringed white banner with the dove of peace carrying an olive branch in the center, and beneath it the word Peace in large letters of gold. The banner carriers were dressed in white, with black bands on their arms, as were Mrs. Henry Villard, who walked alone in front of the officers of the Committee of Two Hundred, Mrs. John Winters Brannan, Miss Lillian Deaver, Miss Lillian Wald and Miss Katherine Leckey directly following her. Behind them were Miss Mary Shaw, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman, and Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett. Some of the women wore dresses of deep mourning. Women of all nationalities, even those from the Orient, were in the procession, and it profoundly impressed those who witnessed it. Such a parade may look very small by the side of the millions of strong men fighting in the field, but love is the dynamic force in this world after all, and will dominate the individual character and national life; and women are exponents of that love, and loyal subjects of Christ, who came to establish peace in the world, the One of whom the prophet thus spoke: "And the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." (Isa. 9: 6.)

Unable to See Dying Son

A PARIS dispatch to the London Times gives this as the true story of the death at Charleroi of Xavier de Castelnau, son of the chief of staff of the French army: The son fell mortally wounded. The father was in another part of the field. An aide told the general his son was dying and wanted to see him once more. "God bless him," said the general, "for I can't go to him," and then continued the direction of the battle momentarily halted, which had cost him such a terrible price. When word of the son's death reached the country house of the general's family in the south, a warm friend undertook the delicate task of conveying the sad news to Mme. Castelnau. She calmly asked, "Which one?" whether it was her husband or one of her sons in the army who had been killed. Such beautiful heroism emphasizes the cruelty and crime of the present war. The patriot has always had to make any sacred tie subservient to the public service, to count family and even life itself as a gift freely to be offered. Christ teaches the paramount demands of a religious life when family reasons were given for not following him:

Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead. (Matt. 8: 22.)

Rabbit Fights a Snake

THE rabbit has been counted one of the most timid and cowardly of animals. The height of impossibility has been represented in the picture of a rabbit fighting a dog. Mr. William Roesner of Salina vouches for courage in at least one rabbit. He says he witnessed a battle between a snake six feet long and a mother rabbit. They fought for several minutes, the snake trying to coil its body around the rabbit while Bunny scratched and tried to injure his snakeship. The rabbit, with one extreme effort, drew away from the snake, and after a rest of a minute, started in for another fight, but at last was caught in the coils of the reptile and was squeezed to death in an instant. Mr. Roesner killed the snake with a club. He then found a nest of young rabbits which the mother was protecting as best she could, and for which she lost her life. The mother instinct in animals is very strong and beautiful. The Saviour enforces an important lesson by this figure of the mother hen:

How often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! (Matt. 23: 37.)

Model Farm, Big Yield

THERE is a truck farm at the extreme end of Long Island which is attracting notice on account of the scientific methods employed, and the enormous crops produced. It is the Halyoake Farm, owned by Lucius H. Hallock, and includes 80 acres of ground. The owner has paid almost no attention to the public, except as his business required it, and has pursued intensive farming out of his passionate love for it. Forty acres of the farm are installed with overhead irrigation, with water from a well on the premises sent sprinkling through iron pipes. Each acre is expected to bear at least two crops during the year. It is not unusual to take 800 bushels of onions from an acre, and at the close of the season to pull 1,200 bushels of carrots from the same ground. This year the onion yield was from seven to nine hundred bushels to the acre for the entire twenty-five acres planted. The crop has already been sold for an average of much more than a dollar a bushel. Besides, there is the potato, bean and other vegetable produce in amazingly large quantities. The farming industry had its beginning at the very birth of our race when

The Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. (Gen. 2: 15.)

Ravages of Army Worm

THE reports from various parts of the country indicate that the ravages of the army worm have been widespread. Fields and estates are in a brief time stripped bare of every green thing by the millions of insects. Heroic efforts have been made to check their march. It seems that everything that lives has some enemy ready to destroy it. The plant scarcely pushes its head above the ground until it finds some enemy ready to attack it and feed upon it. The ravages of the crops by the insects in olden times is thus referred to:

That which the palmerworm hath left hath the locust eaten, and that which the locust hath left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten. (Joel 1: 4.)

REVIEW SUNDAY*

Judge and Lover

By Amos R. Wells

CHRIST is the supreme Judge—the judge of all men, infallibly wise and just. All the lessons of our quarter have dealt with aspects of this great truth.

We have seen him as a judge of character and therefore of deserts. The parable of the vineyard illustrated this on the side of little merit, the ambition of James and John on the side of great merit. The Death Desert in New Mexico is one of the hottest and most arid regions on earth, fittingly named. Once some borers for oil, in the heart of this terrible desert, struck at the depth of two hundred feet an artesian flow of water at the rate of a thousand gallons an hour through a two-inch hole. The desert, it seemed, was all on the surface. It was underlain by potential fertility and beauty. Christ is the supreme judge of human deserts (forgive the play on words!) because he can see beneath all surfaces.

Christ is the judge of our faith, as of that of Bartimæus. His judgment is like a form of gate-opener which they have in the country. It consists of an arrangement of levers. You drive over them and immediately the gate, perhaps eight yards away, swings open to receive you. On the other side you drive over similar levers and the gate closes behind you. Looking at the levers, understanding them, would never open the gate. It is when we drive ahead, like Bartimæus, that Christ recognizes our faith, and rewards it with reception into his paradise of joy.

Then, Christ is the judge of our service, as the parable of the pounds illustrates, and the acted parable of the fig-tree. Egerton R. Young had a newly married wife, a delightful home, a prosperous church. A call came to him to go to the Indians of the far north of Canada. His brave wife said: "This call is from God; we must go." Every one else said. "Stay." If he had stayed, he would have met the fate of the barren fig-tree. He went on his difficult errand, and became a blessing to thousands, an inspiration to millions, one of the most honored of the world's missionaries. Christ judged his unselfish service and gave him the rule of ten cities.

Christ judges worldliness. He judged it with a whip of cords in the defiled temple. He judged it by his parables of the wedding feast and of the wicked husbandmen. Moody was fond of telling about a blind man who sat by the wayside at night with a lighted lantern near him. When people asked him why he had the lantern, since he could not see the light, he answered that it was to keep passers-by from stumbling over him. In the same way, said Mr. Moody, Christians must let their light shine or they will be stumbling-blocks to other men. A worldly "Christian" is one of the greatest enemies of Christ's real church.

As a contrast, Christ is the judge of love. Our lesson on the great commandments lays down the law of love by which he judges. Our lesson on the triumphal entry shows us love speaking boldly and openly. Our lesson on the ten virgins shows us love waiting and watching patiently. Our lesson on the final judgment shows us the Judge of love putting his eternal law into eternal operation. Indeed, we need have no fear as we approach the great judgment seat, if only we have lived lives of love.

The old painters liked to depict the beloved disciple John, and painted him oftener than Peter, or James, or Paul. And when they painted the group of disciples, John was always the disciple whom they made to resemble Jesus most closely. Were not the artists right? Have you not seen husband and wife, though dissimilar in looks at the time of their marriage, grow into a marked resemblance as the years of home living and loving brought their spirits to a genuine concord? Love means likeness. John loved Jesus most deeply, and he must have looked most like him.

This is the secret of the judgment day. Christ must exalt those in whom his own likeness appears, and those will be they that love him.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Thy crown" suggests that for each of us a crown has been prepared, which will fit no head but ours. We need not be jealous or envious. There are crowns enough for all, and our Father will be disappointed if any of his children shall reach the end of life uncrowned. Paul was always thinking of the prize of his high calling, and the crown of righteousness, which the Lord held out to quicken his steps. We cannot explore all that is meant by these inspiring words; but probably the essential thought is that we should not have squandered or misspent the precious hours of our mortal life; but have put them all to the best possible use. Thus God's purpose will be realized, for which he sent us forth, and the "Well done, good and faithful servant," will be heaven's spontaneous verdict. But evidently that happy result can only be attained by a very resolute act by each of us to hold fast to whatever we have learned of God's truth. If we allow this to be whittled away, there will be a corresponding decline in our old-time courage and consecration; and this in turn will tell heavily on the ultimate fulfilment of life's possibilities.

Christian Citizenship Review

By Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts

INSTEAD of attempting to review a dozen Bible lessons in less than an hour, some schools will adopt for adult classes the plan suggested last week of a "report review" of the progress of moral reforms in the three months previous, as chapters in "The Newest Testament of the Grace of God." First, we will hear from our Class Committee appointed to report on the progress of "Peace and Arbitration."

Chairman Peace Committee: The progress just now seems to be mostly backward in an unjustifiable "war" by which it is expected that twenty millions of men will be transferred from the productive pursuits of peace, at a cost of fifty millions of dollars a day, to the destructive business of war. Curiously enough an unprecedented series of European peace conferences had been scheduled for this summer, one in Germany, that was held just before the outbreak of hostilities; another in Switzerland, which met one day near the opening of the war.

Yet many feel that already the world has suffered so much from this new type of twentieth century war that its end will be the beginning of a world government of law. The war has already constrained the United States Senate to pass Secretary Bryan's twenty-one peace treaties, in which that number of nations have agreed with the United States not to go to war with us until the provocation alleged to justify it has been investigated by an impartial tribunal. The big war also silenced the incipient war in Ireland, and both Irish "armies" put themselves at the service of the country. A near-revolution in Russia of striking workmen suddenly changed from denunciations of the government to vivas for the Emperor. The fifty thousand railroad engineers and firemen of the United States who were proposing to strike, dropped their quarrel when the great war itself began its appalling work of commercial paralysis.

On the background of the Austrian Emperor's folly in attacking little Servia, not knowing he would start a world conflagration, the world sees the wisdom of President Wilson's policy of "watchful waiting" instead of war with little Mexico, to which peace has come at last. On August 15, the Ancon made the first passage of the Panama Canal, bearing the peace flag, which is Old Glory with a white border; and although the canal has been fortified, it is definitely agreed by treaty that it shall be open to all ships of all nations, in peace and war, and that no hostile act may be done in its waters. We have faith even beneath war clouds to believe it shall be so everywhere in due time; and it may be that it required the universal tax in blood and money of this great war to complete the argument for compulsory international arbitration.

It would be a good plan to exhibit a number of good newspaper anti-war cartoons. Some of the best are appearing from week to week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Really the best news of the past quarter year, whose value, however, will be marred by the war, is the decision of forty-three of the world's forty-five nations (all except Turkey and Greece), through a recent world parliament on opium and cocaine at The Hague, to go ahead in their world crusade against the drug, despite the refusal of the two Powers named to sign the treaty pending, intended to accomplish ultimately international prohibition of manufacture and sale of opium and cocaine, save for their proper medicinal uses. This result would not have been reached immediately even if there had been no war, and the war will delay it still further, but the goal officially set up in this world treaty is to make it illegal in all lands, as it already is in Australia, to have opium or cocaine in any one's possession without a physician's prescription to justify it. Meantime one-half of China's eighteen provinces have now complete opium prohibition, besides Manchuria's three provinces, despite the great opposition of British opium dealers, against whose protection by the government the Anti-Opium Society of New Zealand has again made strong protest. For the twin drug alcohol, that same goal should be kept in mind. Its banishment from the world is also likely to be delayed by the present great war, in many ways. Scandinavia was on the verge of prohibition, but defense of its neutrality may for a while absorb much of that social energy which was driving against even the "benevolent liquor selling" which has there been tried and found wanting.

In the United States in three months past there have been many indications that the prohibition tide is rising. Half a dozen of the great magazines, which have become able to estimate the direction of public sentiment with great skill, have recently devoted much space to the liquor issue. The Federation of Women's Clubs for the first time this year declared for State and national prohibition. Catholics gathered at Niagara Falls August 13, at the call of Father J. J. Curan, of Wilkes-Barre, and others, to take a step beyond the Catholic Total Abstinence Society, by forming a Catholic anti-saloon organization. Alienists and neurologists, in their national convention in Chicago, resolved that whereas "alcohol, when taken into the system acts as a definite poison to the brain and other tissues," therefore "organized medicine should initiate and carry on a systematic, persistent propaganda for the education of the public" and should "lead in securing adequate legislation." On July 1, West Virginia went "dry" by provision of vote in previous year, and now Wheeling is filled with buttermilk shops, using two hundred gallons a day. The law was published in twelve languages and full enforcement is planned. On the same day Secretary Daniels made the ocean "dry," so far as the United States Navy is concerned, by an order which came just in time to insure sobriety among officers engaged in the delicate task of seizing a Mexican port without "making war" on Mexico. About the first of July the North Carolina State convention of doctors resolved that "alcohol as a drug can be eliminated from the pharmacopœia without in any degree crippling the efficiency of the doctor's armamentarium." St. Paul and Minneapolis also have gone "dry" this quarter under court enforcement of an old treaty with Indians. In the States of Virginia, California and Washington campaigns for State-wide prohibition are on. There is nothing decisive to report on National constitutional prohibition except that the vote in Congress was postponed at the wish of some temperance leaders till "after the November election," and is now scheduled for December 15; and that the liquor people have made a stronger showing in petitions and telegrams thus far than those who have moral but not money interest in the result. Let us here and now vote to send a petition to "U. S. Senate," care of one of your Senators, and a duplicate to the House, care of our Representative, to this effect: "We petition for submission of National constitutional prohibition to a referendum of State Legislatures."

The police commission of Los Angeles has forbidden cashing of pay checks in saloons—a local reform that ought to spread to the whole country; and our Men's Classes in Sunday Schools should help to do it.

(Let other committees of two each report gains and losses in reform movements relating to gambling, Sabbath observance, moral education and other moral reforms—not arguments, but news told in summary, with a view to showing total gains and losses of the three months in the world at large. Our suggestion in June review was that for elementary grades Quarterly Review should be a nature review of the season, in this case texts about Summer and Autumn; and that for Juniors, 8 to 12 years of age, review day should be "Decision Day;" and for the earlier 'teen years, 13 to 15, it should be "Vocation Day," and for classes from sixteen upwards, "Christian Citizenship Review Day." Committees should be appointed, two each, to gather news on above topics all through the quarter to be condensed in 5 to 7-minute reports each review day.)

More Than Ye Ask

FROM Him who hath all things to give
I asked an unnutritious stone,
And when he gave not, made sad moan
That scarce without it could I live.

But when from out his storehouse came
A bounteous gift of bread and wine,
And I beheld it all as mine—
Then low my head was bowed in shame.

"More than ye ask," the promise reads,
And still we go upon our knees
With mean petitions such as these—
Fearful to voice our greater needs.

More than ye ask: 'Tis even so.
Give him a father's chance to do
The things he knows are best for you,
And no more leanness shall ye know.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A NUMBER of friends join in the request for prayer that peace may soon come to the warring nations of Europe. This will continue to be the great burden of prayer of Christian America during these frightful days.

Again we must urge our readers to remember to write only one request or one acknowledgment on a sheet of paper, to write only on one side of the paper, and to make their statements as brief as possible. Care in these details will greatly help the office work of those in charge of the Prayer League correspondence.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received from:

G. M. G., Hartland, Wis.; A. C. T., Arena, Wis.; H. M. L., Milwaukee, Wis.; A Reader, Moravia, N. Y.; G. W., Newton, Iowa; Mrs. . E. H., Ipswich, S. D.; M., Beebe, Ark.; Mrs. . B.; Palisade, Colo.; Miss V. B., Memphis, enn.; Mrs. G. D., West Jefferson, Ohio; Mrs. . E. H., Kent, Wash.; L. J. J., Cutler, Ind.; . L. L., Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. N. E. M., Moores orner, Mass.; G. W. Tit-Bits
Shot from Guns

These dainty morsels—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—go through a strange process in changing from raw grains into airy bubbles.

For an hour—in huge guns—they are rolled in 550 degrees of heat. When the guns are shot, a hundred million steam explosions occur in each grain—one for every granule.

This puffs the grains to eight times normal size. And it fits the granules for easy digestion. Every atom feeds. That's the real reason for Prof. Anderson's process—for shooting the grains from guns. No method less heroic so fits grain for foods.

But This Lighter Side Attracts You

But the fascination lies in the almond taste.

It lies in airiness—the flakiness. It lies in the thinness of the myriad toasted walls.

You never have tasted a ready-cooked cereal so appealing as Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

CORN PUFFS 15¢

Any Puffed Grain is delightful with sugar and cream or with fruit. But the flavors differ vastly. Find out which you like best.

Puffed Wheat is preferred by most people for floating in bowls of milk. Puffed Rice makes the best confection—for use in candy making or as garnish for ice cream.

For eating dry—like peanuts or popcorn—Corn Puffs doused with melted butter is usually preferred.

The three grains with the many ways of serving offer infinite variety. Order the one you haven't tried and compare it with the others.

HIS FLAG

BY M. L. GUTHAPFEL

A SUDDEN, sharp rush fell upon the room. Eight hundred pair of mostly black eyes gazed in astonished interest at sweet-faced Teacher, who said, with tears in her eyes:

"It is with sorrow we take up our lessons this morning. We have no little flag-bearer. Our little Geta, who died yesterday of the fever, was a good little girl. We also should try to be good, so that it might be quite well with us when we, too, come to die."

A sharp intaking of the breath by eight hundred little throats answered the teacher's "when we, too, come to die."

Teacher paused, and went on more cheerily: "We are not going to die for a long time, I hope. And now we will select another child to carry our flag. As we go in turns, our flag-bearer must now be a little boy."

Her eyes roved around the chapel of the Five Points Mission. About four hundred pair of big eyes glowed and burned and peered eagerly at Teacher. And four hundred little hearts beat high with hope.

No, I am wrong. Not four hundred hearts, only three hundred and ninety-nine of them. One little heart was in a pair, miserable little emaciated body, whose owner did not even dare to hope he would be called upon to carry the beautiful "colors."

Little Marcus had been sent to school by the order of the probation officer of the police court, much dreaded by the father. But in the long hours from the close of school till midnight he was ordered on the streets to beg, dodging the police and the prostitute officers, afraid to tell them for fear the father would beat him harder and starve him even more. There was no mother in the home now.

But Teacher is speaking. "We will let our newest scholar finish little Geta's time, to show him that he is welcome among us. Come, Marcus, you are the flag-bearer. Rise, children, and stand at attention as the flag-bearer comes to his new post of duty."

It was impossible for Marcus to believe that it was all true. He must be dreaming in his cellar at home and would soon awaken to reality. Not until his hand was placed around the flag-staff, and his eyes caught sight of the waving red, white and blue of his new country, did he come to life.

Forward first, then to the right, down the aisle, up the next, eight hundred little voices chanting "The Stars and Stripes Forever," as the flag wended its way, held aloft by a starry-eyed, joyously happy boy, while four assistants trotted proudly behind, until the march was accomplished and the proud carrier paused, and once more faced the school.

"Salute the flag!" called Teacher. "Ready! One!" Seven hundred and ninety-nine little bodies were alert. "Two!" They stood with right hand touching the temple, palm outward. "Three!" and the hand extended forward and to the right in salute, while eight hundred voices chanted, "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Marcus awoke early the next day and stepped breakfastless into the street after a hasty ablution.

He had a penny which his father had donated as supper money. It now bought a roll at a lunch counter, and for some reason the owner of the lunch counter, looking into the glowing dark eyes set in the pitifully thin face, hastily pushed toward him a full cup of coffee just poured for himself.

Feeling much refreshed, Marcus finally reached Broadway, and asking the time, was told that it was eight-fifteen. Down the nearest street he sped, his heart beating wildly. What if he should be late the first morning after his appointment as flag-bearer? The thought was torture. Block after block he ran, dodging under horses' hoofs, dashing in front of automobiles at the peril of his life.

He finally paused, panting, within one block of the school building, and asking the time of a newsboy, was told it was only 8:25. He could not get into the hallowed presence of the flag until 8:45. He stopped in front of an apartment house which even at this early hour teemed with life. He leaned against a lamp post to get his breath, and dully watched a woman scrubbing the front steps. She was janitress of the apartment house, Mrs. Bridget O'Flannigan by name, and she weighed two hundred and forty-six and one-half pounds, and was proud of it. She feared no one, neither allowed any to dispute her will in anything or in any way.

As Marcus's breath returned, he unconsciously watched Mrs. O'Flannigan wielding her brush vigorously over the steps; then, as she returned it to the bucket, he saw her draw forth the cloth to wipe up the suds, and then—it happened.

A dash, as a small boy in a wild rage swept across the intervening space and with one bound landed in front of the industrious Mrs. O'Flannigan. A frantic hand clutched at the scrub-rag in her hand; a foot kicked the bucket and it turned over; two fists shot out and landed in Mrs. O'Flannigan's face and chest. The blows acted like a sledge-hammer upon her, for they caught her unbalanced and unprepared, and with a wild shriek she toppled backward and sat down heavily upon the pavement, while the bucket merrily dripped its contents over her.

A crowd gathered at once, a policeman came running, and pushing to the front saw the prostrate woman dripping with dirty water, and wildly calling on all the saints to defend her, for she was "kilt intirely."

In front of her, fairly dancing up and down in hysterical rage, and crying out unintelligible things, was Marcus. In his hand he clutched a dirty scrub-rag, which at the approach of the policeman he hastily pushed dripping wet into the pocket of his coat, an act which no one seemed to notice.

The officer of the law helped the prostrate woman to her feet with soothing words, while an obliging bystander held the quivering boy at the officer's request. Mrs. O'Flannigan righted and soothed, the officer grabbed the collar of the boy, and turning him to his victim said: "Sure, and what's all this about?"

There was silence on the part of the boy, whose breast still heaved with convulsive sobs. Mrs. O'Flannigan, however, poured forth an incoherent story about the wild foreign trash, and her desire to see them eliminated from the earth. The officer scratched his head; he could make nothing of the case. Shaking Marcus from time to time, he sought to extract some information from him, but Marcus was dumb. The wild blind rage had passed away, but the officer's uniform and the clutch on his collar told Marcus two things, first, that he was in the dread clutches of the law, and second, that it must be 8:45—time for the school door to open. In fifteen minutes the beautiful flag of which he was the appointed bearer would be carried by some one else. Oh, why had he not stopped to think? He must get away. He must reach the school.

His efforts along that line brought an extra shake and a fierce command from the officer: "Stand still, there!"

All this time Mrs. O'Flannigan's story was being poured forth, but he had heard it not. The officer heard but could not understand. Finally he managed to ask, as the lady paused for breath, "And what will ye be charging up to this silent Guinea kid? We'll tell the magistrate the rist."

"Well, Mr. Hooligan," she said, conscious of her audience, "I charge the bye wid assault and battery wid intint to kill." The crowd gasped. Things looked serious. "We will be goin' now to the station house, Mrs. O'Flannigan."

The magistrate looked kindly down on the poor little figure and said: "Why, officer, what's the matter here?

"What are you doing with a sick boy?" the officer explained, ending, "And so, your honor, the lady, Mrs. O'Flannigan, charges him with 'assault and battery with intent to kill,' but the story of it all none of us knows. Sure, the bye will not, or cannot talk. Not a word has he said."

The magistrate looked over the desk and down into the two big dark eyes that were like coals in a pale wan face. "Why, bless his heart!" he said under his breath; "he's all eyes, but they don't belong to a criminal." Aloud he said, "Got anything to say, my lad? Don't be afraid. What made you do this?" No answer. "Call Mrs. O'Flannigan." He spoke rather sharply. The boy must be made to speak when spoken to in the court.

Mrs. O'Flannigan hustled forward, one eye showing unmistakable signs of having come up against a foreign substance. Called upon by the magistrate she poured forth her story, ending with, "And now, your honor, I charge this bye wid assault and battery wid intint to kill."

"Assault and battery with intent to kill!" cried the magistrate, keeping in his laughter with difficulty. "Why, you reckless, brutal boy, how dare you attempt such a thing upon the person of Mrs. O'Flannigan, when she is so small and defenseless, and you—so tremendous in size?" A titter went around the crowded courtroom. Mrs. O'Flannigan looked around, but the point of the remark was lost upon her. Silence and sober faces greeted her look. All looked at Marcus, as the magistrate said:

"Boy, what is your name?"

"Marcus Polites."

As the boy spoke his name a slight sound was heard near the door of the courtroom, and the pleasant voice of a lady who had just entered said: "Sir, one moment. I think I can get at this."

"Come, then, Miss West," said the magistrate. He believed in the help of that deaconess probation officer.

The crowd moved aside as the lady with the white bonnet strings hurried forward and knelt on the floor beside the pitiful little figure. "Why, Marcus, what is it? Tell Miss West. You have meant no wrong, I am sure. Tell me all about it quickly."

"Missy West, I—I— Oh, Missy West, the flag, the flag—Tony, too late for me—"

"Hush, Marcus, you must be calm and tell me slowly."

The courtroom was silently listening as Marcus sobbed into the white bonnet strings the whole miserable story. "I got it here, Missy West," he said at the close, "I got it here in my pocket." Miss West placed her hand on the designated pocket and found it running with water. She drew forth a much soiled scrub-rag.

One glance, and she put it back into his pocket. "Marcus, listen to me," she said. "I want you to do something for me. I want you to stand up here on a bench and tell them just this last part when I tell you to. Don't be afraid. It's for the sake of your flag, and the republic for which it stands."

"Your honor, a few words in explanation," she said, as she rose to her feet.

"Certainly, Miss West."

The courtroom listened breathlessly, as with skilful words she pictured the motherless boy, the cruel drunken father, the begging, the order to go to school, the providing of the clothes, the forced continued begging in spite of the orders, the death of Geta, the selection of Marcus as flag-bearer, his joy, his morning walk waiting the time to carry the flag again, the watching Mrs. O'Flannigan at her scrubbing, and the quick, now much regretted feeling of rage, and—the lady paused with husky voice and tear-wet eyes—"Your honor, may Marcus state in his own way why he got angry?"

"Yes, bring him here to me," answered the court. "Let's hear it."

The boy was lifted to the magistrate's side by Mr. Hooligan. "Now, Marcus," said Miss West, slowly and distinctly, "why did you get angry at this lady? Tell his honor, and show them all why you did this."

The boy's sad eyes lifted, caught sight of a little flag over the desk, and fear was forgotten. "Why, cause-a de flag, my flag, I carry him. I do dis-a way to—see, Jedge," and his hand drew forth from his pocket a dirty scrub-rag. He flung it outward, and behold! a ragged, dirty, one-time American flag was exposed to the eyes of all the courtroom.

A gasp went round. The magistrate hurriedly got out his handkerchief. The silence was finally broken by Mrs. O'Flannigan. "May the saints presarve us, an' I niver wance noticed it was a flag. I called him a foreigner, too. I withdraw the charge, your honor. I want the blessed bye an' the lady to come to me house. I'll give thim a dinner that will put flesh on the darlin' child's bones, and I'll wash the rag and give it to him, an' he may kick me down me own steps if I iver agin use the rid, white an' blue to do me worruk."

"One moment, Mrs. Flannigan." The magistrate had found his voice.

"Marcus Polites, turn around and face the court. Here, hold this in your hand with the other piece." He handed Marcus the flag from behind the desk. Dazed, but not afraid, the boy, with eyes burning and glowing, looked at the judge for further orders. "All in the court, stand," and the judge arose to his own feet, "and do as I tell you, on pain of contempt of court. Now, Marcus, show us how to salute the flag." Joyfully Marcus saluted, and recited the pledge of allegiance. "All present do the same to the two flags Marcus holds." Instantly hands were raised to foreheads, the salute was given while the magistrate led in the words, "I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

"Amen," said the judge, feelingly. "Amen," responded the audience, and forgot they were not at church.

But Marcus did not understand it all, only that he was free and had missed carrying the flag, and that was a thing to feel sorry about. He whispered this to Miss West on the way home to Mrs. O'Flannigan's dinner. The whisper caused Miss West to stop in at a drug store and hold a long conversation with Teacher at the mission.

The first smile that Marcus's face had held that day appeared when Miss West brought the news of the need of the flag-bearer at the school at 1:30. He radiated beams all during the stuffing to which Mrs. O'Flannigan subjected him, her tears alternating with the hugs and kisses she inflicted upon him as he ate. She accompanied him as he and Miss West journeyed to the mission, and she sat on a front seat at 1:30—a decidedly chastened soul—as the piano, with an extra loud voice, commanded "One! Two! Three! Four! March!" And when the salute was being given Mrs. O'Flannigan both smiled and wept as she gazed on Marcus, "his flag, and the republic for which he stood."

BELLAS HESS & CO
WASHINGTON, MORTON & BARROW STS
NEW YORK CITY, N.Y.

DURING A SHOWER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

HAVE you ever been caught in a shower—a great splashing, furious shower, that blackened the sky, and sent a shivery, crying wind through the trees? But of course you have.

One day last week I was walking down a street in New York to the subway station—a street rather notorious for its overdressed shop-girls, and underfed children, and loud men. A street lined with little shops that peer furtively at the passer-by, and lure the innocent stranger in by a promise of gowns and hats at "very interesting prices." And as I walked along calmly with the eyes of an observer, the sky clouded over and the storm broke angrily above my head.

I was too far from the subway station to make a dash for the dryness of my train, and the down-pour did not give me time to hesitate and think. I ducked, unceremoniously, under the very gay, very wet awning of a store—perhaps the largest on the block.

Did you ever make a dash, suddenly, from one place to another? It takes away the breath, doesn't it, and chokes the eyes up, and makes you absolutely indifferent to anything but yourself? For one dripping, confused moment I was absolutely oblivious to my place of refuge, and then as the stray drops of water rolled from my skirt, I began to pay attention to my surroundings.

I was standing between two show windows, hastily lighted to show up against the sudden blackness of the street. A white crêpe de chine, moyen age gown on an impossibly smiling bisque model, gazed out at me like a Lorelei from behind the sheltering glass. As I gazed back, fascinated, a voice sounded at my elbow—a shy voice with a marked New York accent.

"It's pretty, ain't it?" inquired the voice.

I turned around to answer the speaker, and saw a little errand girl in a tight-fitting black skirt with shiny seams, and a very much bedraggled white shirt-waist. Imitation pearls hung from her thin neck, and a huge imitation ruby glowed on her finger. Her head, with its elaborately trimmed, tawdry little hat, was inclined to one side, and her eyes, half closed, were gazing with the rapt look of an artist at the white dress.

"I've always wanted one o' them," she confided, "an' this season I want one mor'n ever—they're so sweet!" She gave a half-humorous, half-sad little chuckle. "What's the use!" she asked me. "I've saved up again and again, and then, bing! the whole business goes up in smoke. Sometimes I lose my job, sometimes th' rent's due, sometimes th' baby sister's sick. Then it all ends up by buyin' a few yards of ten-cent stuff and tryin' to copy the pattern. It's no use!" She lapsed into discouraged silence.

As she showed no further inclination to speak I glanced around, curiously, at the other refugees from the storm. There were quite a number of people crowded into the narrow space, and as I looked, I thought of the picture that Gibson or Flagg could make of it. There was a woman in a bunchy shawl, an Italian woman, from her hair and complexion, who murmured words in her own tongue and eyed the spattering rain-drops sullenly; there was a lady with dyed hair and a violet suit with stockings to match, who stood as far as possible from the street and dragged her cleverly draped skirt away from her silken ankles. There was a little newsboy, with eyes that might have belonged to a Raphael cherub, and clothes that might have come out of a rag bag; and three women with very ornamental vanity cases, and too red cheeks, that talked loudly in a corner, glancing out at a slender man with drooping shoulders, heavy lashes, and a checked suit of English cut. There they stood, in the brightness of the doorway with the shifting wall of rain sweeping grayly in front of them.

"I wonder," it was the wistful little errand girl's voice again, "I wonder if it's ever goin' to stop? Seems as if," she laughed, "it rains and pours every time I go out without a parasol—but when I have one, why, you couldn't scare up enough water to drink!"

"It's the truth," I agreed thoughtfully. I remembered with a little wrath the time I had wasted carrying raincoats on sunshiny days. "I've done it bushels of times myself."

The little newsboy slipped to the very tip edge of the dry space under the awning, and thrust out a small grimy hand.

"It's still rainin'," he announced to the world at large, as he drew back into the dryness of the doorway and surveyed the wet, clean spots on the brownness of his skin, "an' if it keeps up it'll knock my business, the papers'll get all wet, an' I won't be able to sell 'em."

The lady with the violet suit and the dyed hair looked up, sharply, at the little ragged figure. Then she smiled and the smile made her painted lips seem very soft and sweet.

"Here, kid," she said in a husky, but not exactly harsh, voice. She opened a silver-mounted purse stuffed with bills and extracted one of them. "Here, take this! I'll buy your papers."

Over in the west the clouds were breaking up, and a tiny spot of brightness—perhaps from the dying sun—shone out faintly through the mistiness. The raindrops were small, now, and they did not beat so heavily upon the drenched pavement. Venturesome folk, with gingerly held skirts, were skurrying along the street with furtive eyes on the still threatening sky.

With a last look at the shimmering white dress, the little errand girl turned away from the window.

"Good-by," she told me. A cheerful smile flickered across her plain little face. "I'm glad the dress is on this street—I can see it every day goin' to work."

The three women were talking loudly with the man in the English suit, and the violet-gowned lady had swept into the store with a backward glance at the hurrying errand girl. The newsboy, with tight clenched hand, darted away, and all at once I felt strangely isolated and alone and tired. I crept out from under the awning and ran through the softly falling drops—drops that were no more than a thin mist—toward the subway. And as I ran the setting sun, jewel-like, radiant, swept away the last cloud.

Questions and Answers

B., Deerfield, Wis. I am sadly troubled. I feel I love God more than anything on earth and I feel that there is nothing on earth that I covet more than being a good and righteous Christian; but when temptations come I have not the will power to resist them, and when I have sinned it makes me very sorrowful. I have tried time and again, but I always fail, and I have almost made up my mind that it is useless and that I cannot be good. Yet I love the Lord and wait for his appearing, but I feel I cannot go to him if I go along in this way. How does God look upon me, and how can I acquire a stronger will power?

Let us analyze your letter. You say: "I have ot the will power to resist"; "I have tried"; I always fail"; "How can I acquire a stronger ill power?" Now the Bible promises all have different emphasis. What God wants is that e should not count upon any power in ourelves, but rely altogether upon his power. So ng as we are trusting in any power of our wn we shall fail; but while we are trusting in is power we do not fail. Notice the wording f this typical promise, Ezek. 36: 25-27 (see ow God wants to substitute his great self, his ," for our sinful, weak and failing self): Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, nd ye shall be clean. From all your filthiness, nd all your idols will I cleanse you. A new eart also will I give you, and a new spirit will put within you; and I will take away the tony heart out of your flesh, and I will give ou a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my tatutes and ye shall keep my judgments and lo them." The secret of being kept is to let God keep us. At the time you realize your weakness most keenly, then is the time God will give his power most abundantly. Paul says: "When I am weak then am I strong." II Cor. 12: 10. We wonder, and struggle, and fret, and try to find some new way, when, after all, there is only one way. "Trusting Jesus—that is ALL!" Avoid being introspective. Take it for granted God is going to keep you; put all your dependence upon him; then plunge ahead and try to forget all about yourself in service for others. You have the basis of a splendid experience and great spiritual power. God can use people like you who are conscious of a great, tender love for him. If you love him do not grieve him by any further doubts, but go ahead and trust him to make you a victorious and fruitful Christian.

Mrs. W. W. K. What is the meaning of "scarlet" and "red like crimson" in Isa. 1: 18: "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool"?

These terms are used because red is such a vivid color and making such deep stains. Smith's Bible Dictionary states: "The only fundamental color of which the Hebrews appear to have had a clear conception was red." Another authority states: Certain scarlet cloth is first dyed in the grain and then dyed in the piece; it is thus double-dyed. In contrast with this our souls are to be washed white, like the "undyed wool," and even like the snow. The contrast is between a deep stain and purity.

Dr. V. S. McN., Pasadena, Texas. Who is meant or alluded to as "that man of sin, the son of perdition," in II Thess. 2: 3, 4?

Here the apostle is describing the apostasy and other evils that are to come in the latter days. The "man of sin" referred to in verse 3 is identified as the Antichrist mentioned in Revelation. Antiochus Epiphanes was the Old Testament type of the "man of sin," and many modern authorities have held that the New Testament Antichrist is to find fulfilment in Romanism, "whose final phase will be an unholy alliance between idolatry and infidelity."

J. C. B., Dyer, Tenn. 1. The "Dark Ages" were the period from the death of Charlemagne (A.D. 814) to the close of the Carlovingian dynasty (A.D. 987). It was a time when literature and culture generally and all the arts languished, and civilization in Europe was at a very low ebb. Ignorance prevailed among the people and only a few were able to read. During that time, the Bible remained in the possession of the church, and we have no record to show that any effort was made to disseminate its truths or to spread the Gospel message. 2. We know nothing about the early history of Masonry. 3. The story of the building of Solomon's temple, the preparations for which had been made by his father, David, is told in I Kings, 6th chapter. Josephus the Jewish historian in Antiquities, 14th chapter, says that David charged Solomon in these words: "I was willing to build God a temple myself, but he prohibited me, because I was polluted with blood and wars; but he hath foretold that Solomon would build him a temple." David had already gathered toward this project ten thousand talents of gold and 100,000 talents of silver, besides a great quantity of building material, and it is probable that plans had already been made for the structure.

Inquirer, Lanesboro, Mass. The Lord's Day is for rest, and recuperation, worship and spiritual refreshment. The Jews themselves limited their physical activities to two and one-half miles—"a Sabbath day's journey." To spend the day in pleasure jaunting or field sports is desecration.

A. W., Galt, Ont. Girolamo Savonarola was an Italian moral, political and religious reformer. He became a Dominican monk at Bologna in 1475. He brought about a religious revival by his denunciation of the vice and corruption prevalent both in the church and the state, and was one of the chief instruments in the overthrow of the Medici and the restoration of the republic in 1494. He incurred the enmity of Pope Alexander VI, whom he had denounced, and was in consequence excommunicated in 1497. He was arrested at Florence in April 1498, and put to death (strangled and then burned) at the instance of the Pope.

J. C., Maurel, Texas. There has been much discussion concerning the meal at which the Lord's Supper was instituted, as to whether it was the Paschal supper, according to the Jewish law. The first three Gospels indicate that the use of the guest chamber was secured in the manner customary with those who came from a distance to keep the festival. The three evangelists state that "they made ready the Passover," and Jesus himself calls the meal "this Passover" (Luke 22: 15-16). After a thanksgiving, he passed around the first cup, and when the supper was ended, there was the usual "cup of blessing" and a hymn was sung, presumably the last part of the Hallel. John's Gospel, however, would seem to imply that the Lord's Supper took place the day preceding the usual Jewish Paschal meal. (John 13: 1-2.) In John 10: 14, when our Lord was before Pilate and about to be led out to Calvary, we are told that it was the "preparation" of the Passover, and again, after the crucifixion (verse 31), the Jews were solicitous because it was still "the preparation." Further, the law of Ex. 12: 22 was that none should go out of the door of his house until the morning after the Paschal supper, although this law may have come into disuse. Lightfoot, a leading authority, claims that the Supper was held two days before the Jewish Passover, while Bengel held that it was eaten the evening before the Passover. The question is an open one, and in view of conflicting opinions of commentators, it will probably so continue.

H. K. D., Wapello, Iowa. The story of John the apostle having been put into a caldron of boiling oil is traditional, not historical. Tertullian mentions it in his writings and remarks that the boiling oil had no power to hurt him. The scene of this traditional miracle is said to have been outside the Porta Latina in Rome; the time, the great persecution by Domitian. Afterward the apostle was exiled to Patmos.

Mrs. M. McC. I have been afflicted for two years and now have terrible thoughts and fears, when I see a knife or any weapon. Please pray for my healing.

In such cases it is a relief to know that this kind of nervous trouble is not uncommon. Read Burton J. Hendrick's article in the July number of McClure's Magazine on "The Disease of Fear and Its Cure." In it he describes at length a case precisely like yours, and tells of its cure. Prayer is also a tremendous help, but there is much that a good doctor can do to restore the troubled nerves and brain cells to normal conditions. Determine that you will trust God. Take his perfect peace for your soul, and then believe that moment by moment he will keep you. Read some of the great "anti-fear" passages like the 121st Psalm, and compel yourself to realize that they were written for you: "He will not suffer thy foot to be moved; he that keepeth thee will not slumber. . . . The Lord is thy keeper. . . . The Lord shall preserve thy going out and they coming in from this time forth, and even forever more."

J. M. K., Philadelphia, Pa. What is known as the "faith verse" (Heb. 11: 1) is a description of faith in its widest sense, not restricted to faith in the Gospel alone. "The substance of things hoped for" is interpreted to mean that faith gives substance to God's promises by enabling us to take hold of them with absolute confidence, and making them present realities to us, although yet unfulfilled. By the assent of faith, we already enter into the enjoyment, in a spiritual sense, of those things that are promised; or, as one expositor has expressed it, "through faith, the future object of Christian hope in its beginning is already substantiated." By faith we are sure of eternal things that they are, and by hope we are confident that we shall have them. The clause, "the evidence of things not seen," refers to the soul vision that enables us to see what the eye itself cannot perceive." Calvin wrote on this subject: "What should we do if we had not faith and hope to lean on, and if our minds did not emerge amidst the darkness, above the world, by the shining of the Word and spirit of God?"

R. B., Bar Harbor, Me. What are the "decisive battles" of history?

Actium, B.C. 31; Marathon, B.C. 490; Chalons, A.D. 451; Hastings, A.D. 1066; Siege of Orleans, A.D. 1429; defeat of the Spanish Armada, 1588; Blenheim, 1704; Pultowa, 1709; Saratoga, 1777; Trafalgar, 1805; Waterloo, 1815; Sebastopol, 1854; Gettysburg, 1863; Sedan, 1870; Port Arthur, 1904.

Several readers have written, giving variants in the translation of that clause in the Lord's Prayer which says "Lead us not into temptation." Dr. H. W., of Toronto, Canada, writes that "lead us out of temptation" is more in accord with the meaning of the original. Still another writes that "Leave us not in temptation" is the preferred rendering. These suggestions are not new. See the paragraph on the subject in Mail-Bag of August 19.

N. H. C., East Ryegate, Vt. There is no passage in the Bible which specifically urges the laying by in store for an emergency, although several can be found which imply that a reasonable provision (not a selfish hoarding) is right and proper. See Deut. 28: 5 and 8; II. Chron. 32: 28; Prov. 30: 26; Prov. 10: 4, etc.

Old Subscriber, San José, Calif. We should be content to trust the future in God's hands. There are many charlatans, who, by trick and device, lead the credulous to believe them specially gifted as necromancers, diviners, crystal-gazers, fortune tellers, etc., but people who run after them are apt to regret it. The Bible contains many warnings against such practices.

Mrs. J. J., Dennis, Kan. See Ex. 19: 16 to 25; also the opening verse of the 20th chapter. The people were not permitted "to come up unto the Lord" on the mountain, but Moses and Aaron went up. In the 20th chapter, verse 21, it is further added that "the people stood afar off," while Moses was receiving the divine instruction which he afterward communicated to them as having been spoken by the voice of God.

H. M. McC. The government is conducting a very vigorous inquiry into the exorbitant rise in foodstuffs, and municipal authorities in many cities are taking steps to protect the consumers against the rapacity of the "price-boosters" who have used the European war as an excuse for their extortion. There are several passages in Scripture denouncing as wicked the withholding of food from the people. See Prov. 11: 26; Job 22: 7 and 31: 16, etc.

A STORY OF JOYOUS SERVICE

BY LUCY RIDER MEYER

Founder of the Chicago Training School

THE AUTHOR

"CAREFUL, husband! You'll break it," I warned. Mr. Meyer was prying around the top of a little can of chicken soup with his pen-knife.

"Oh, no, I won't!" he replied, happily, still prying away. Then, suddenly, snap went the blade! And I remembered distinctly, though it was twenty-nine years ago, that I did not say "I told you so!" Which fact is the nearest to a demonstration that I ever had that original sin is somewhat subdued in me.

We were, I think, speaking with due consideration, the happiest two people on the face of the whole round earth, that day in late September, 1885. It was Sunday noon, and we were sitting in the dully-lighted little kitchen of an almost unfurnished house on the "West Side" of Chicago, eating our dinner. The only furniture of the room was the two wooden chairs we were sitting on and a dry-goods box which, with a newspaper spread over it, was doing duty as a table. The lunch was not elaborate and the broken pen-knife was a pity, but nothing marred our supreme joy. Were we not in the very house that was to be used, please God, as the domicile for the Chicago Training School? And, to go a step farther back, had not a certain committee in whose doings we had the greatest confidence, voted that that school exist?

To be sure it was a small house, as school buildings go, and not in perfect repair. Neither had we furniture and the other conveniences for a school. And—rather more serious still—there were no students either, except that we were hopefully corresponding with two or three who might later decide to come; and the only teachers in sight were my husband and myself—I who was eager to devote my whole time to the project, and my husband, who was to give it such time as he could spare from his little mission church. But Mr. Meyer was going to paint the parlor floor in the morning, and we were going to write more letters, many more, asking for students and furniture, and the good pastors and lecturers of the city would come in and help us with the teaching and—oh, back of all and best of all—God had called us to this work! It would surely succeed! And here was the token—the house. What wonder that we were happy? I remember that it flashed across my mind, in one of those high moments, "Can anything in the world make me ever again really unhappy?"

It had been a hard summer's battle, to arouse interest in the enterprise. Friends and supporters had to be gained for it one by one, for the very thought of such a school was almost a new thing under the sun. "Bible study?" our critics would say. "Why, the young folks can study the Bible in Sunday school." And then I would begin again my learned-by-heart explanation: "Oh, no, not the thorough, connected Bible study that missionaries and Christian workers ought to have. Why, you wouldn't call any one to doctor your sick horse who wasn't a veterinary surgeon, and ought not the one who is to care for these eternal interests to have at least a few months of special training for his work?"

At last there came an opportunity to present the cause of the school before one of our ministers' meetings, and a committee was created to take the matter under advisement. But even so, interest languished. God was for us, however, and one day—I like to tell the story, it shows so plainly his wonderful overruling—he almost cast down great stones from heaven in our behalf, as he did for Joshua once. At any rate he cast down great drops of rain. It had been very difficult to get our committee together—every one was "so busy." So we had taken advantage of a great missionary meeting, at which we knew all "our" people would be present, and had called a meeting of our committee immediately afterward. But the meeting was long, and at its close everybody went streaming toward the door and dinner, quite ignoring the little committee meeting that was to have been. "Oh, some time later," one of them said. "We really can't stop now—it's too late." But before the people could reach the door of the large assembly "tabernacle"—this is a true story that I am telling—the Lord opened the windows of heaven, and there came pouring down floods and torrents of water. Umbrellas were perfectly useless against the downpour. Rubbers? Not many had them, and while they hesitated, the water stood on the ground inches deep like a little lake. And it kept on raining—the people couldn't possibly get away. Mr. Meyer and I exchanged happy glances, and then we flew around the folks suggesting that surely now we might as well have our meeting. And wouldn't such and such a friend come, too?

We had our meeting—a large one and a long one, for the rain kept up. We didn't adjourn till the history-making resolution was passed that the school be opened. There have been significant rains before in the course of human events. And many a rain, the experts tell us, is worth millions of dollars to the farmers for the thirsty corn and wheat that would die without it. But never was there a rain with just the message of this one, we told ourselves, and never one that was welcomed with more grateful hearts.

Into the little rented house we moved, Mr. Meyer and I, one Saturday night—it was the day before that happy Sunday dinner in the kitchen. School was to begin very soon. I improvised a desk out of two more dry-goods boxes—it is really wonderful what one can do with dry-goods boxes on a pinch—and sent out hundreds of letters and circulars. A stenographer volunteered to help. Furniture began to come, sometimes piece by piece, as we needed it for the incoming students. God never failed to send the bed before the "new student" got there, though once the expressman blundered and somebody slept on the floor or in some other unbecoming place for a single night. The money for our living expenses, too—for the small amount our students are able to pay has never met expenses—came in the same way, little by little as our necessities grew. We were "cramped" sometimes—and are yet. We don't always know where support will come from for the next new student who "just must not be turned away" whether she has money to "pay her way" or not, but it always comes. We go without luxuries sometimes, but we never go hungry.

Some funny things did happen though. I was the house manager at first, and to be quite candid, I think I am not really a genius at housekeeping. Canned soups were just beginning to appear on the market, and they were, as I gratefully remember, my pièce de résistance in many an emergency. Sometimes, however, I ventured oyster soup. I essayed this, I remember, at my first formal dinner party in the new building—our committee and their wives and husbands being the guests to discuss some matter of business—oyster soup, with no

LEARNING THINGS

We Are All in the Apprentice Class

When a simple change of diet bring back health and happiness the stor is briefly told. A lady of Springfield Ill., says:

"After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I re ceived a shock four years ago tha left me in such a condition that m life was despaired of.

"I got no relief from doctors no from the numberless heart and nerv remedies I tried, because I didn know that coffee was daily puttin me back more than the doctors coul put me ahead.

"Finally at the suggestion of friend I left off coffee and began th use of Postum, and against my ex pectations I gradually improved i health until for the past 6 or 8 month I have been entirely free from ner vousness and those terrible sinking weakening spells of heart trouble.

"My troubles all came from the us of coffee which I had drunk fron childhood and yet they disappeare when I quit coffee and took up th use of Postum." Name given by Pos tum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Many people marvel at the effect of leaving off coffee and drinking Pos tum, but there is nothing marvelou about it—only common sense.

Coffee is a destroyer—Postum is a rebuilder. That's the reason.

Look in pkgs. for the famous littl book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be wel boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a solubl powder. A teaspoonful dissolve quickly in a cup of hot water and with cream and sugar, makes a deli cious beverage instantly. 30c and 50 tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds i about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

course following between that and the rice pudding! One really doesn't need meat after a good soup, I argued, and oysters are very good. At another time I fled to my old stand-by, canned soup, in desperation; for we were just moving into a larger building; there was a family of some fifteen of us, it was noon and the only stove available was a little kerosene affair with one burner. It sufficed, however, for heating the soup and we had bread and butter and we gathered around the table with thankful hearts. A blessing was asked and the soup was punctiliously served. Then a laugh rang out—the spoons were not unpacked! They were in a box at the other house.

I long ago ceased to be the culinary manager of the great institution—we often number 250 souls—and with the incoming of housekeepers and bookkeepers things go more by system with us. But there are ever new lessons of faith to learn—lessons quite as important as were any in those days when we ate our bread literally from hand to mouth—from God's hand to our mouths.

The little rented house overflowed with students that first year. Next spring land was purchased, and in a few months, a building stood solidly upon it—as much the gift of God, that building (and all our buildings), as if it had come down from heaven on ropes and pulleys! Students came, too—the second year about forty—till now, in these twenty-nine years of our existence, we have trained altogether more than three thousand. They have gone literally to all parts of the world, and are in all kinds of work—anything to hasten the coming kingdom. Three hundred and one are in foreign mission fields; twelve hundred and more are in the home field as deaconesses, home missionaries, etc., and another great host are in their own fathers' homes or have gone out to found new homes, to be better Sunday school teachers and workers in the church, better neighbors and friends, better and broader women in every respect for the training and the wider vision of the world and its needs, and especially the Bible study they received in the school. And another great group will gather this fall. And the joy of service has never grown less!

4949 Indiana Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

A PRAYER FOR PEACE

GOD of the nations, with thy mighty hand,
Help, in the hour of need, thy stricken land.
Turn thou to peace the warlike hearts of men,
That they may live in harmony again.

Stay now the angry rush of battle's tide;
Hold back the stream, lest it become too wide,
And, flooding all the land, leave in its stead
The barren ground, strewn with the nations' dead.

And then the years of struggle to repair
The ravaged land that once was rich and fair,
To dry the widow's tear, the wounds to lave,
And place the wreath upon the hero's grave.

O God of Peace! Hear now thy people pray.
Send forth the dove, and brush the clouds away,
That battling nations may look up to see
Thy oriflamme, and turning follow thee.

Souvenirs From the Holy Land

To every one who fills out one of these Coupons according to the conditions we will send FREE of Charge a Special Souvenir personally selected in the Holy Land by the President of The Christian Herald

Last spring Mr. Koenig, President of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, visited the Holy Land in quest of special features for your favorite paper, and in the course of his pilgrimage collected a number of souvenirs.

These souvenirs consist of pebbles from the Dead Sea, shells from the Sea of Galilee, with actual photographs showing these souvenirs being collected by natives and members of the American Colony, baked clay lamps made in the time of our Lord, pressed flowers of Palestine, and beautiful post cards showing colored views of the Holy Land.

These souvenirs, necessarily limited in number, will be presented with our compliments to CHRISTIAN HERALD workers who send us one or more of the coupons shown on this page properly endorsed.

Each coupon calls for a four-months' new subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at half price. They are offered by us at this season in order to give our friends an opportunity to help spread the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by placing it in homes where it has never before been read.

We are sure every friend will welcome such an opportunity not only to extend the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but to possess each for him or herself one of these genuine souvenirs which Mr. Koenig has brought back from the Holy Land, and which therefore can be accepted as a genuine memento of his visit.

None of these treasured objects is for sale, but any of our friends who will influence new subscriptions for four months, at half the regular price, may possess one. If you cannot induce a friend to subscribe for half price, you may make a present of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a friend or acquaintance, in which case you will fill out one or more coupons and mail them to us at once, and the souvenir or souvenirs to which you are entitled will be sent you FREE of charge.

These Souvenirs Are for You

Given for ONE COUPON

For sending us one coupon properly endorsed and accompanied by the proper remittance we will send you free a card containing beautiful pressed flowers from the Holy Land tastefully arranged in a decorative design.

Given for TWO COUPONS

For two coupons we will send you free seven beautiful post-cards containing colored views of the Holy Land. These cards were purchased by Mr. Koenig in Jerusalem. They comprise views of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Garden of Gethsemane, Dead Sea, Grotto of the Nativity, etc., etc.

Given for THREE COUPONS

An olive wood paperweight especially cut and polished in the Holy Land with the word "Jerusalem" stamped upon it in English and Hebrew. This will make a tasteful ornament for your desk.

Given for FOUR COUPONS

For four coupons we will send a collection of pebbles picked up on the shores of the Dead Sea and shells from the Sea of Galilee accompanied by a proper authentication of their genuineness and a picture of natives gathering them.

Given for FIVE COUPONS

For five coupons we will send a clay lamp, like those used in the time of Christ, and referred to by him in the parable of the wise and foolish virgins. These lamps are genuine antiques, made in the time of Christ.

Given for SIX COUPONS

For six coupons we will send you a genuine Bibleland tablet covered with cuneiform characters engraved thereon by a scribe who lived in ancient Babylonia in the time of Abraham, about 2300 before Christ.

GRAND EXTRA REWARD

To every person sending us six coupons properly endorsed and accompanied by 25 cents each, we will send in addition to the Bibleland tablet mentioned above, seven actual photographs (not half-tones) taken by Mr. Koenig himself in the Holy Land, showing Excavations at Samaria, Jaffa Gate, Jerusalem, City of Tiberias, Pool of Moses, Shepherd Boys Visiting Jerusalem, Mary's Well, Nazareth, Eastern Wall of Jerusalem.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NCES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

ble Program of Missions*

HE Bible contains a very definite plan for missionary work. If that work is to prosper and triumph it must be carried out ible lines.

the first place every follower of s is to make it his business to win, by is testimony and service, as many s as he can to Christ's salvation. should put his life where the need he greatest. The power of that fa has taken thousands of faithful rkers to the foreign field. But, ther at home or abroad, every fol- er of Jesus must be a missionary. nd this, according to the Bible, is missionary's business:

o tell men about sin. To awaken r consciences. To show them that are responsible to an infinite al Ruler, who cannot tolerate ng.

o tell them about Jesus, who came earth and died in order that men ht be set free from the conse- nces of sin, and might have a new er in their lives to keep them from ning.

o tell them that Christ's plan in- les the principle of service for ers; that sin is after all the prin- e of living for self; that Christ's n is that we should live not for self for him, and that the only way we do that is to live for others.

o tell them about heaven, its joys l opportunities and rewards, and them that our standing there will end upon our faithfulness in ser- e here.

o tell them that the chief part of duty of service is to win others to rist. Converts on the mission field ke good soul-winners. Gradually native churches are becoming self- porting and are sending out not y soul-winners among their own ple, but missionaries to other lands t are still without the Gospel.

When we have added that the neces- y expenses of missionary work are be met by the free-will offerings of d's people and that this cause takes ecedence over every other in the urch budget, we have outlined the ief points in the Bible program of ssions.

Saved to serve; saved to save.

Concerning Poverty†

HE full text of our lesson topic is "Industrial Slavery in the Light of o Standards." The two standards ferred to are indicated by the "Year Release" in the Mosaic Code (Deut. : 1-11), and the statement of Jesus Luke 4: 18 that he has come to each the Gospel to the poor and to t captives free. What the Mosaic de provides is the relief of the poor. he New Testament, on the other nd, lays down a program which will t only relieve poverty, but put an d to it. Christ's words: "The poor have always with you" (John 12: Matt. 26: 11; Mark 14: 7), have ten been interpreted to mean that verty will exist until the end of the orld. But he did not say that. He as talking to his friends and his ac- uaintances of that day. He said: You shall not always have me with ou. Whatever you wish to do for e must be done quickly. But the oor shall be always with you. They ill be here after I have gone away." he Saviour Christ is no friend, or lly, or advocate, of poverty. Premier squith but voiced the wish and de- rmination of Jesus of Nazareth hen he declared at the beginning of his ministry that he was engaged in "an implacable warfare against poverty."

Of the Mosaic measures for the relief of the poor the seventh-yearly release was one of the most beautiful and helpful. It provided that no debts could be pressed during that seventh year. They were not canceled, but, because on this Sabbath year the fields were not tilled, no one could be forced to pay a debt. But the New Testament is altogether revolutionary. Christ's words and principles not only provide relief for the poor, but strike at the very roots of the system that produces poverty. Poverty is inevitable when men are competing with one another for gain, each man trying to get something away from the other man. This is "business," a game often to the death, in which one man or firm tries to get the best of another. In many businesses that is not the motive, but the organization of the commercial world is such that it is almost sure to be the method. And so long as this strife goes on some one will be crushed.

But Christ brought to earth a new plan, a plan of brotherhood, of love, of co-operation, of universal helpfulness. The Jews were exclusive. God was their God; the law was their law; they were the rivals of all other nations; they had no dream of the brotherhood of the nations. But Christ helped the despised Samaritans, healed the Syro-Phœnician woman's daughter, taught universal kindness, and told his disciples to preach his Gospel to all "nations." His great ambassador Paul declared that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men."

How far short the world comes from this ideal of Christ the present unspeakable war in Europe shows. And it is almost equally far from his ideals in matters of business. But the world must come to his ideals—both in national and business affairs. It has made a beginning of learning that his laws are right for the individual. It must accept them as binding in the world of toil and commerce and in the relationship of nations.

Look up the labor problem in your town. See if the workers have good air while they work; if they have time to sleep and eat, and some time to play; see how long they live and how much of the time they are sick; see how they live, and whether they have enough to live in comfort; find who gets the real benefit of their toil; try to find out for yourself what Christ thinks now of industrial conditions in America, and what he wants us to do about them.

Every Christian a Missionary*

READ the notes on the Baptist Young People's lesson. "The Bible Plan for Missions" tells how every Christian can be a missionary. That means you.

You can be a missionary by your testimony; by your gifts; by your prayers; by making it your chief business to persuade others to come to Christ; by faithfully representing Christ in your conduct, at home, at work, wherever you are, all the time; by picking out a few definite people whom you will try to help and cheer in definite, practical ways; by helping to make your community, your State, your nation, what Christ wants them to be.

Study the passage from Galatians:

Let him that is taught teach.
Sow spiritual seed.
Be not weary in well-doing.
We shall reap if we faint not.
As we have opportunity let us
DO GOOD UNTO ALL MEN.

THE JESUITS THE REAL PAPAL POWER

THE "Society of Jesus," popularly called the "Jesuits," is the largest secret organization in the world, and its secrets are most sacredly guarded. It is true that there has been published what is purported to be "The Constitution of the Jesuits"; but it is not really "the constitution," but only a pretense. The authorities, conscious of the just clamor which the publication of the real constitution would excite, obliged all members of their mysterious order to maintain a profound secrecy respecting it.

The whole of their mysterious policy was never discovered to the ordinary, nor even to all the professed Jesuits. To the novices are communicated only the apostolic letters of Julius III, the abridgment of the constitutions, and the common rules. Nor have the other Jesuits access to any additional information concerning the nature of their institutes but such as relate to the charge with which they are immediately entrusted. No Jesuit, therefore, who might be expelled from the society could possibly reveal its secrets in any complete and satisfactory manner. In a letter from one of the assistants of the order at Rome, written towards the middle of the eighteenth century, there are expressions of the following import: "It is only since my arrival here that I understand anything of the nature of our society. Its government is a separate science of which the provincials themselves know nothing. It is necessary to be in the post which I occupy to begin to comprehend it." The still further precaution was adopted by the general of using a cipher code in his correspondence; and it was directed that immediately on the death of any person who had in his possession letters from the general, the assistants, or the provincial of his order, such letters should be instantly burnt without being read.

The "Society of Jesus," almost from the time of the founder, has been regarded with no ordinary interest. Unlike the other orders of the Roman Church, the Society of Jesus was designed for active service. Its members went everywhere, insinuating themselves into every secret society, and assuming every form and shape. Having become the confessors of sovereigns, the policy and plans of governments were in their possession, and it was made their duty to transmit these to the general of the order. Being a secret society with no badge or countersign, they awakened no suspicion. Their numbers made them formidable. Sometimes we find them exploring the fields of science; sometimes, aping the Puritan mien, they stood with long faces in Puritan pulpits, to prove the ceremonies of the English Church to be but the "rags of Popery"; and then, anon, we detect them contriving a "gunpowder plot"; attempting to murder a queen; or busy among the people, stirring up a conspiracy against a sovereign, for the purpose of crowning a Popish pretender. Again and again they have been banished as outlaws from Christian countries. England, Venice, Portugal, France, Spain and Sicily have driven them from their coasts, and for a long period of stormy revolution on the continent of Europe many a deeply laid plot against the person of a sovereign, many a device for the deprivation of human rights and the enslaving of the public mind, can be traced to Jesuit influence.

Under date of July 21, 1773, Pope Clement XIV issued his famous bull "for the effectual suppression of the Order of Jesuits." This bull commences as follows: "We know that we are established by the divine Providence over kingdoms and nations, in order to pluck up, destroy, disperse, dissipate, plant or nourish, as may best conduce to the right cultivation of the Vineyard of Sabaoth." He then traces the origin and history of this society, and declares that "almost at the very moment of its institution, there arose in the bosom of this society divers seeds of discord and dissension, not only among the companions themselves, but with other regular orders, and secular clergy, the academies, the universities, the public schools, and lastly, even with the princes of the states in which the society was received. These dissensions and disputes, he says, arose sometimes according to the nature of their vows, etc.; sometimes concerning the absolute authority assumed by the general; sometimes concerning different points of doctrine, and he adds, "in short, accusations of the greatest nature and very detrimental to the peace and tranquillity of the Christian republic have been continually received against the said order. Hence the origin of that infinity of appeals and protests against the society, which so many sovereigns have laid at the foot of the throne of our predecessors, Paul IV, Pius V, and Sixtus VI."

He then alludes to the efforts made by certain Popes to remedy these evils and silence these accusations and complaints; and names Urban VII, Clement IX, X, XI, XII, Alexander VII and VIII, Innocent X, XII and XIII, and Benedict XIV; and still, he says, complaints and disputes arose concerning "secular affairs with which the company ought not to have interfered"; and "certain idolatrous ceremonies adopted in certain places"; and "certain maxims which the Holy See has with reason proscribed as scandalous, and manifestly contrary to good morals"; and "the revolts and intestine troubles in some of the Catholic states."

He closes by saying: "Our will and meaning is, that the suppression and destruction of this said society, and of all its parts, shall have an immediate and instantaneous effect, . . . that these our letters should forever and to all eternity be valid, permanent and efficacious."

Notwithstanding this plain and forceful declaration of the will and meaning of Pope Clement XIV, Pope Pius VII, on August 7, 1814, just one hundred years ago, re-established this society. Since then very great care has been taken that none but a Jesuit shall occupy the papal throne, so that, while the Pope is nominally the head of all the religious orders, yet, as a Jesuit, he is obliged by the most solemn of vows to render explicit obedience to the general in all things. Accordingly, the authority whereby the Church of Rome is governed is not in the Pope, but in the general of the Society of Jesus.

AMONG THE WORKERS

EVANGELIST IRA EVANS HICKS conducted a three weeks' campaign in Dowds-Lando, Iowa, 16 August among the many converts being several aged people.

REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D., who with Mr. Alexander, had engaged to conduct a series of evangelistic meetings at London and Cambridge, England, also at Dundee and Aberdeen, Scotland, finds it necessary to postpone these meetings on account of the war. The English committee feels, however, that it is not a great opportunity they have cabled Dr. Chapman to come over and conduct a campaign in London for men only. Dr. Chapman has accepted, and is scheduled to sail from this country September 23, and hopes to return by Christmas. It has not been fully decided what his program will be after his return, but there is a possibility he may conduct a campaign in the South, mainly in North Carolina.

ONE YOUNG MAN in Central Church, Worcester, Mass., won the ninth Go-to-Church Band award for perfect attendance for the term of four months ending with May—thirty-six months without failure at preaching service. Five completed eight terms. There are now 116 churches with these bands. The founder divides the members into two classes; thirteen years old and younger in a junior department, fourteen years old and older forming the senior department with the adult members; the result is that enthusiasm is kept alive and children who have thus learned the church-going habit grow up with it.

The English have lost two unimportant gunboats, and the Germans some torpedo boats and a submarine. Several more merchants' vessels have blown up by floating mines in the North Sea. This is regrettable but hardly avoidable.

The Germans made a raid from one of their naval bases on the English fishing flect in the North Sea, capturing 12 or 15 and sinking a few. This proves that the Germans are not completely bottled up yet. In consequence England has put out all the lights along the Scotch coast.

It would not be very surprising if the English fleet attacked either Wilhelmshafen or the entrance to the Kiel Canal on the North Sea side before many days are passed. English public opinion is commencing to demand some determinative naval action.

On September 6 the British cruiser Pathfinder struck a mine in the North Sea and was destroyed, 246 of her men being either killed or as yet unaccounted for. A number of badly wounded were rescued from the water by torpedo boats which arrived on the scene almost immediately after the explosion.

Great caution must be observed in believing reports coming from Paris or London in regard to the action of either Bulgaria or Rumania. The last state has for years had a semi-secret alliance with Austria, which both parties have lived up to heretofore; and if Rumania throws the weight of her forces in the scale it will probably be on the side of Austria.

Bulgaria is more uncertain, but it is almost inconceivable that she should side with Servia. Still the unexpected has a way of happening.

It looks as though Italy would continue neutral for some time. Eventually she will almost inevitably be drawn into the fray.

Referring back to our correspondent's reference in the early part of of the above article, who reports of atrocities, we reprint the follcwing Associated Press despatch appearing September 7:

In spirit we unite in rendering (sic) German atrocities groundless, as far as we are able to. After spending two weeks with and accompanying the troops upward of 100 miles, we are unable to report a single instance unprovoked. We are also unable to confirm rumors of mistreatment of prisoners or of noncombatants with the German columns. This is true of Louvain, Brussels, Luneville and Nantes while in Prussian hands.

We visited Chateau Soldre, Sambre and Beaumont without substantiating a single wanton brutality. Numerous investigated rumors proved groundless. Everywhere we have seen Germans paying for purchases and respecting property rights, as well as according civilians every consideration.

After the battle of Biass (probably Barse, a suburb of Namur), we found Belgian women and children moving comfortably about. The day after the Germans had captured the town in Merbes Chateau, we found one citizen killed, but were unable to confirm lack of provocation.

Refugees with stories of atrocities were unable to supply direct evidence. Belgians in the Sambre Valley discounted reports of cruelty in the surrounding countries. The discipline of the German soldiers is excellent, as we observed.

To the truth of these statements we pledge our professional and personal word.

Why POSTUM
Instead of Coffee

Better Nerves — Better Digestion
Less Biliousness — Less Headache
Sound Sleep — Clear Brain
Steady Heart Action

If you are a coffee drinker, and find discomfort or symptoms of disease are "on your trail," it would be a good idea to think of the drug, caffeine, about 2½ grains of which is taken with every cup of coffee.

The pure food-drink, POSTUM, made only of wheat and a bit of molasses, has a rich, Java-like flavour, but is absolutely free from the tea and coffee drug, caffeine, or any other harmful ingredient.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be boiled.
Instant Postum—a soluble powder.

A teaspoonful of the powder stirred in a cup of hot water—with cream and sugar—makes instantly a delightful beverage.

A great army of former coffee drinkers now use POSTUM.

HUDSON Six-40 1915 Model $1,550 This Year F.O.B. Detroit

Howard E. Coffin
Chief of the 48 Hudson Engineers

The Final Authority

On New-Day Quality Cars

The new HUDSON Six-40—like all former Hudsons—is a Howard E. Coffin creation. So were cars before Hudsons—cars which marked some of the greatest steps in motor car progression.

Legions of men who have owned these cars regard Mr. Coffin as final authority in this line of engineering. So do legions of others who have watched motor car evolution.

Do you know another designer who has accomplished so much, or has led in so many advances?

Go See His Ideal Six

The HUDSON Six-40 for 1915 is the finished model of Mr. Coffin's ideal car. It shows his final conception of the new-day type.

He has worked for four years on it. So have 47 other HUDSON engineers. Thus this HUDSON Six-40 is their composite idea of the modern high-grade car. It is their latest and best, in big things and little—in beauty and in mechanism, in equipment and detail.

If there are faults or shortcomings—if any car excels it—then these 48 engineers are mistaken. But that isn't thinkable. You will find in this HUDSON Six-40 the representative car of today.

It Differs in Degree

The HUDSON Six-40 is not unique. It is simply in advance of others in the almost universal trends.

Practically all of the upper-class cars are now Sixes. And that designer is rare who doesn't consider the Six as his final goal. It meets his ultimate object—continuous power.

Lightness is a common trend. The old excesses—due to wrong materials or crude designing—are being rapidly wiped out. The HUDSON engineers—in this 2,890-pound car—have merely excelled their rivals.

Low operative cost is sought for by makers and users alike. But the HUDSON Six-40 saves more than others, by record lightness in this class and by a new-type motor.

All aim at beauty, comfort and attractions in equipment. But 48 designers have worked four years in perfecting the HUDSON refinements.

And the price trend is generally lower. Larger production and standardization make this expected and possible. But the new HUDSON Six-40—selling $200 lower than last year—best shows what efficiency can do.

Five Bodies—No Delays

The HUDSON Six-40 is built this year with five beautiful new-style bodies. Note the list below. Each offers countless up-to-date attractions, some of which are exclusive to this car.

With our trebled output this year we are coping with demand. We go to extremes to save delays to our buyers. Up to this writing, 45 per cent of all this season's shipments have gone out by express—trainloads to single cities.

Today you can get prompt delivery, despite this car's amazing popularity. Go see your HUDSON dealer. If he cannot deliver a car at once, he will see that you don't wait long.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Independance Belge

HOW strikingly, in its sudden changes of advantage, this war in the last few days has resembled the vicissitudes of the average human life!

When we left the German army it was apparently on the high road to immediate victory, and today victory has apparently mockingly receded, after having been in their grasp.

In Belgium, to begin at the usual departure points for several days all was quiet. The invaders contented themselves with making sure the positions already taken, and the Belgians remained motionless. Suddenly, the Belgian army made a sortie, and falling on the invaders at Malines and Tirlemont, hurled them backwards towards Brussels. But this advantage was only momentary. The Germans returning in force drove the Belgians back under the protection of the Antwerp guns, and advancing to the westward siezed Ghent.

The advantage of this movement to the Germans lay in the fact that by holding Ghent, which is situated between Antwerp and Ostend, they prevented the Belgians in Antwerp from joining forces with the English marines who were known to occupy Ostend.

There have been persistent rumors that the British had landed a second army at Ostend during the last few days, but the probabilities are very much against the truth of this rumor.

Any troops in force that England sends to the Continent she will naturally send at present to some point in friendly territory, from which they can progress to the front through friendly territory. Troops landed at Ostend would, on the contrary, have to fight their way through country held by the enemy for nearly 125 miles before they reached the present line of battle. Late in the week most of the German troops in Belgium left for France to reinforce the German battle line there, their places being taken by troops of the reserve and second line.

DIEST, BELGIUM, STREETS BARRICADED; REFUGEES FLEEING

The Germans continue to treat Belgium, or rather those portions of it in their control, as German territory; they have now introduced German postage stamps and money and added Germany to the postal address, refusing to deliver letters not so addressed.

Some details of the terrible effects of the fire of the new German howitzer siege guns as shown by the Liège forts have reached us. The Liège forts were of the mounting turret type, and when the turret was not raised, presented practically no target. To fire their own guns, which were mounted in these chilled steel turrets, 28 inches thick, the turret was raised with its guns by hydraulic power till it projected some four feet above the surrounding earth, the gun then fired, whereafter the turret sank back again out of sight. The diameter of the turret did not exceed twenty-four feet, the fort otherwise was practically all under ground and was built of stone and steel, and could hold from 500 to 2,000 men.

This brief description gives some idea of the type of fort existing at Liège and of the difficulty of their reduction by bombardment.

The German howitzers were planted about four miles from the fort intended to be attacked, and after the range was found, it is stated that the complete ruin of the fort was only the affair of a few shots. The projectiles pierced the twenty-eight inches of chilled steel of the turrets as though it had been so much cheese, and crashing downwards into the vitals of the fort, exploded, working havoc. One of the few survivors of the garrison of one of the forts says that he was in one of the lower guard rooms with about 175 others when the first projectile struck the turret of this fort and came crashing through. When he came to himself the whole fort was in ruins. Massive steel girders and uprights twisted as though they had been made of wax, heavy stonework in a crumbled mass of ruin, and besides himself only two others were left alive.

The magazine of one of the forts was hit, and of that fort there is literally nothing left, only a hole in the ground, several acres in extent and proportionately deep, to show where it once had been. Fort, guns, garrison, have completely vanished as though they never were.

There are said to be some 10,000 bodies in the ruins of the Liège forts, impossible to get at in the tangled mass of wreckage. The total loss in killed outright of the Belgians at Liège is said to exceed 15,000, the bulk of it in these forts, from which practically none escaped.

If the German siege artillery can do this against forts built to withstand vertical as well as horizontal fire, what would be their effect on fortifications like those of Paris, built to resist horizontal fire only?

During the early part of the week the German advance was steady and uninterrupted, the Allies retreating from one position to another, as best they could. This advance of the German army continued with unabated force and fury, till the advanced guard of their right wing reached Chantilly, seventeen miles from Paris, whence their line of battle ran northeastwardly to Verdun.

While the Germans were thus advancing, the French were hurrying troops into Paris in the expectation of an immediate siege. While the siege did not take place, these troops afterwards proved of unexpected value to the Allies, as the sequel will show.

ANTWERP HOUSE PIERCED BY FRAGMENTS OF AERIAL BOMB

this point, Chantilly, the German advance halted. The German strategy did not contemplate a siege of Paris while the allied field army existed, capable at any time of taking the offensive against a besieging force. The large numbers of men which the Germans had been obliged to leave as garrison, etc., in Belgium and as the besieging force at Maubeuge, which fortress was not reduced but only invested when the advancing Germans swept by, had so weakened their effective force that they did not have enough men to besiege Paris, and to keep a sufficient field army to oppose the Allies' field army. Consequently, it was necessary for them to attempt to crush the allied field army first.

To do this, the Germans attempted to work the same strategy, the "sweep of the door," that they had worked so successfully in 1870-71, but this time in the reverse direction.

To understand clearly what is meant by the "sweep of the door" I shall ask the reader to take a small piece of string, a pin and a map of France. Find Verdun on the map and pin one end of the string at that point. Then, holding the string taut, cut it where it reaches the Swiss border.

The string represents the German army, and the path of the whole string in moving the end from Paris to Switzerland represents the course its line of battle was projected to take, driving the allied army before it until the latter was in a corner where it would either have to risk a decisive battle in a bad position, or cross into Switzerland, as Bourbaki did in 1870, and be neutralized until the end of the war.

But the best laid plans of mice and men, etc.

To bring the right wing of the German army into position to execute this movement, it was obliged to halt its movement southward and turn to the eastward, and, defiling in front of Paris, strive to reach its new position. In doing this it necessarily exposed its flank to the enemy, a fact of which the enemy immediately took advantage.

GERMAN HOWITZER SIEGE GUN

The German right wing, though violently attacked, finally succeeded in reaching its assigned position at Meaux, a place a little (about twenty miles) to the northeast of Paris. On arrival at this point, however, it was the subject of a violent frontal attack from the forces of the Allies' field army, and an equally violent lateral attack by the troops of the Paris garrison. This, of course, put this wing in the impossibility of beginning its part in the general movement, and thus dislocated the entire plan. Reinforcements are coming up to the Germans from Belgium and from the troops released from the siege of Maubeuge, of which more hereafter.

The Allies, however, have been largely reinforced. The advance guard of England's East Indian troops has reached her army, and is now on the battle line. Other reinforcements have arrived from England, but of how many troops they consisted is unknown. The stream of fresh troops to the English forces will be quite heavy for the next month. She has perhaps 115,000 now in the field and this figure will probably be doubled in thirty days.

The German position now begins in the west somewhere near Château Thierry, and thence runs eastward through Epernay, Chalons, Clermont to Verdun, thence turning and running southeasterly through Pont-à-Moussons, Lunéville to the Vosges Mountains, and on the Alsatian side of these to Muelhausen. This latter place the French have recaptured, it is said.

The German position is not bad except on the right wing, and there the situation is precarious. In the fighting of the last few days they have lost heavily, both in casualties and prisoners, but the allied casualties have been very heavy also, as is proved by the English official list.

While these things have been happening on the main battle line, elsewhere in France the Germans have had the advantage. The fortress of Maubeuge, which I have heretofore mentioned as in process of investment by the Germans, was on Wednesday obliged to surrender. By this surrender the Germans gained an important strategic point, and also one of importance in keeping their line of communication with Belgium open, besides taking an immense quantity of war material and some forty thousand prisoners, among which latter figure one of twelve thousand English. This news is unconfirmed.

The English casualty lists show an abnormally large loss in officers. This results from the tradition in the British army that an officer should not seek cover, or lie down behind the line of his entrenched men. This is gallant, but it is not war from any standpoint. From a standpoint of an army commander it is folly. It is better to lose a hundred men than one officer, since you can make a fairly good soldier in three months, but to make a good officer takes years, and besides, all men are not good material to make officers from.

France has called up the class of 1915 to the colors, which means the young men who would naturally join their regiments next fall. These will not be available for some months for the line of battle. She has also ordered all those previously exempted from military service to submit to a re-examination, and further has ordered the prefects to have search made in their prefectures for any able-bodied men between the ages of 20 and 52, who are not with the colors. By those two last measures she hopes to add 400,000 to her effectives. But they will require training, and in any event will be troops of more than doubtful value.

ALGERIAN TROOPS LEAVING PARIS

England has voted an additional 500,000 men to be added to her regular army. These, also, will have to be trained.

The situation along the Austrian border seems not to be particularly favorable to that Power, and it would also seem that there are some internal troubles of moment in that country.

I personally pay but little attention to the romances in the guise of bulletins issued from Petrograd, to use the new name of the familiar St. Petersburg, and even less to news coming through Rome. The reason for this skepticism on my part is founded on personal experience and on a somewhat detailed knowledge of Russian customs.

The way to read a Russian bulletin is simple. If it speaks of Grand Duke Nicolas Nicolavitch it may or may not be true. It will never be the tidings of a defeat in such case. No prince of the blood ever is defeated in the bulletins. This is etiquette. It may have been noticed that in the bulletins of the defeat of Allenstein, the names of the generals commanding the corps are given. This is never done in case of a victory. These bulletins are practically all the news we receive of the fighting along the Austrian border; the general impression from the news from other sources is that Austria is not living up to reasonable expectations.

It would seem as though Galicia had fallen largely into Russian possession, but it may not unreasonably be doubted whether or not the possession of this turbulent province will add greatly to Russia's power or happiness, or whether, which is more important, it plays any rôle in an attack on either Vienna or Berlin.

The Austrian and German counter-offensive in Russian Poland is said by the Russians to have been beaten back with great loss, but each succeeding bulletin still has something to say about this movement. Now, if beaten back with great loss, why continue to speak of it in a way which indicates it as still a matter of anxiety?

In the Russo-Japanese War, the day before Port Arthur surrendered the Russian official bulletin said that the Japanese were on the point of abandoning the siege with enormous losses. It may be the same thing here. Some day we will get real news from Austria, and then it will not be found to be on all fours with the Russian bulletins. I do not expect such news to be a tale of victory, but I do expect it to be a tale of honorable defeat.

The Slav is very often a victim of romantic auto-intoxication in matters concerning his own interests. So we will dismiss Austria, simply saying the general situation does not look too favorable and without attempting the impossibility of precising that situation.

In East Prussia, the situation is clearing. The Russians are attempting to reform on the eastern frontier after their crushing defeat at Allenstein, but this reformation is being rendered difficult by the continual attacks of the Germans. They are also attempting a bombardment of Koenigsberg, but are not yet really in position to commence a siege of that place.

ARTILLERY PASSING THROUGH TOWN

They are not attacking Breslau, far from it. No Russian troops, according to their own statements, are within one hundred miles of Breslau, and yet in the selfsame bulletin it is soberly stated that they are bombarding Breslau. Evidently, they possess some new and heretofore unsuspected kind of artillery.

This, however, is quite in line with the sensational headlines of some American newspapers, which state that the Russians are "on the road to Berlin," when as a matter of geographical fact their advanced point in East Prussia is four hundred miles from that city.

Turkey has supplied another unexpected sensation during the week by abrogating the clauses in all her treaties whereby either special privileges are given to, or special burdens imposed on, the Sublime Porte. Her object is to get rid of the ex-territoriality of foreigners residing in Turkey for one thing. Up to the present time a foreigner in Turkey was not subject to the law of the land, but questions civil and criminal involving him or his property had to be tried in the consular court of the nation to which he belonged.

Fighting caused by the European War is even going on in Central Africa, witness the combats this week in the Congo Free State and in the Cameroons. Japan is making very little progress in her attack on Kiauchau.

On the water very little is going on. The White Star steamer Oceanic, which many of my readers will no doubt remember was taken by England as an auxiliary cruiser, has been wrecked off the Scottish coast, and is a total loss. The British gunboat Pathfinder, which was originally said to have been sunk by contact with a floating mine, was, it now turns out,

THE WINONA BIBLE CONFERENCE

WINONA LAKE, Indiana, offers the public a great diversity of attractions during the summer months. The Chautauqua program is replete with entertainments and lectures of the highest character, and the outing features are inviting and stimulating. Nature has bestowed with lavish hand the adornments of the park. The luxurious shade of the forest trees, the graceful terraces, the numerous fountains and flowing wells, the picturesque lily pond and the magnificent lake, all contribute to the pleasure of the senses, and provide rest and recuperation to body and brain.

But the high tide of interest and broad expanse of opportunity and enjoyment at Winona comes at the time of its great Bible Conference in the closing days of August. At this time the attendance always increases, and the capacity of the hotels and cottages is often taxed to the limit. Ministers, seeking for inspiration and added knowledge of the inexhaustible text-book of their Master, missionaries and Christian workers, desiring to catch a new vision of life's responsibilities, and all others who would know more of the truths of the Bible and increase their efficiency for service, gather at this place to hear the earnest, scholarly messages that fall from the lips of the eminent speakers.

JAMES M. GRAY, D.D. MARION LAWRANCE W. E. BIEDERWOLF, D.D.

The season 1914 has been a notable one. Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D., of London, delivered a series of sermons, profound, instructive and helpful. Rev. Charles Brown, of Ferme Park Baptist Church, London, was another of the speakers who held his audiences in rapt attention. Rev. John McNeill, D.D., of Toronto, awakened keen interest by his fiery eloquence. Dr. Robertson, of the Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky., threw a flood of light on the historical parts of the Book by his learned discussions from day to day during the conference. Dr. James M. Gray, dean of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, emphasized the literary value of the Bible. Evangelist William E. Biederwolf preached a number of times at the Hillside. He is associate director of the Winona Bible Conference, and closely identified with the International Association of Evangelists which holds its annual meetings here. Evangelist Milford H. Lyon, who recently became a resident of Winona Lake, gave several remarkable discourses. On Thursday, August 27, excursion trains brought six hundred people from Muncie, Kokomo, Marion and Logansport, cities in which Mr. Lyons held revival meetings last winter.

Dr. Frank N. Palmer gave eight lectures on Systematic Bible Study. Marion Lawrance, the Sunday School leader, delivered a number of lectures glowing with animation. Dr. Wedderspoon, pastor of Foundry M. E. Church, Washington City, brought a message that was appreciated. Dr. James I. Vance, of Nashville, Tenn., sounded the keynote of optimism in two carefully prepared addresses. "Bob" Jones touched the hearts of his hearers by his striking word pictures. Revs. B. B. Sutcliffe, Rohold and Rubens, each spoke on "Jews' Day." The interest in these converted Jews and their wonderful recitals was so marked as to place this special feature on Winona programs permanently.

Dr. Charles S. Medbury, prominent in the Disciple Church and pastor at Des Moines, Iowa; Rev. George E. Guille, Bible teacher in Moody Institute; Rev. Frank E. Higgins, the "lumberjack" of the Northwest; Rev. Herbert C. Hart, president of the Evangelists' Association; Rev. Frank A. Miller, superintendent of the children's services; Rev. Charles Stelzle, sociologist; Major Cole, Rev. J. K. McClurkin, prominent Presbyterian minister of Pittsburg; Professor Charles Scanlon, general secretary of the Board of Temperance, Presbyterian Church; Dr. George R. Stuart, popular as lecturer and preacher, and many others appeared during the conference.

The great choir of two hundred voices led the congregation in the song services, and every one felt the exhilaration and stimulus of the soul-stirring songs. There were no dull moments during the ten days of this notable gathering, and the atmosphere was pregnant with a deep feeling of religious fervor.

Simultaneous conferences were held at Chicago, Muncie, Bluffton, Rochester and Peru, the speakers being furnished from the distinguished men on the Winona list. This experiment met with hearty response, and will be repeated next season.

Dr. Sol C. Dickey, secretary and general manager of the Winona Assembly, and director of the Winona Bible Conference, has incorporated a movement to carry Bible Conferences into various parts of the United States during the winter months, and is making engagements for these events. He has retained a number of prominent foreign and American speakers who will accompany him on these itineraries, and there is every reason to believe blessed results will follow the undertaking. The eagerness with which the people receive the teaching of the Scriptures is one of the most encouraging signs of the growth of the kingdom. Winona's most important achievements will come through its Bible Conference.

HOW EUROPE'S PEASANTS SUFFERED BY THE WAR

THE little village of Blamont, near Avricourt, France, lay bathed in the calm hot sunlight of August a few weeks ago. The grain was almost ripe for harvesting; the millers were busy grinding flour for the bread, and the bakers baking it. Then came the call to mobilization, and the men of Blamont went away down the road, while the women did their part to fill the gaps left in their midst, happy in the thought that they had given their loved ones to their country. Little knew they what was before them!

One morning early came the soldiers, riding over the hills. Blamont and the surrounding towns were in the track of the invasion! Soldiers came thicker and thicker, melting into the landscape, yet covering all. They settled down on the village like a swarm of bees, demanding food, wine, fodder. Among the houses which had to answer their demand for food was the Castle, and in the castle was an American couple who were imprisoned there, who, having lost all they had and being unable to find even a horse to convey them away, were obliged to remain. The words of the woman, Mrs. L. B. Kendall, a New Yorker, used to luxury, but bearing bravely her discomforts, best describe her experience.

"In a few days," she said, "not only the adult men, but the boys and old men had disappeared from Blamont and the surrounding villages. Blamont became a place of women and babies. There was no harvest to reap. Everything in the track of the invading army was trodden to bits, and what had been garnered and stored was eaten by the troopers' horses in a few days; but in the fields you could see women about to become mothers, and old women, staggering under burdens that would have been heavy for a horse, as they went about collecting odds and ends and scraps to carry home. The carrots and turnips were dug up and eaten; the wine-cellars drained dry; for you know it is the rule of war to live on the enemy's country till it is exhausted, and not till then to begin to use the stores brought from home. My husband and I often said to each other: 'When the soldiers are gone, what then?' for there was scarcely a morsel of food left in the place. The maire of the village was in captivity, and his wife, who was our hostess at the castle, assumed his duties, doing her best to aid the distressed. She doled out the contents of a few bags of rice which she had—a handful at a time—while it lasted. I can see now those poor peasant women who came in their wooden sabots and aprons to take it home in their bowls! These people can make a little go a long way. But famine was not the only thing to be dreaded; the stench that came from the hundreds of unburied bodies lying everywhere grew to be unbearable even before we left. Poor Blamont! What future is before her!

"The last few days of our stay we saw all about us the smoke of burning villages, and thousands of women and children from seven towns came to us, homeless as well as destitute. Still there is always so much that is good to look for! The women whose babies came in this time of confusion and trouble were sheltered and cared for."

The foregoing description applies to great areas of Europe today. Villages burned, thousands left homeless, fields trampled, storehouses looted—this is war!

Do not think that the sufferings of war are confined to one country and that the invaded one. Germany, too, is a land of tears and mourning today. An American lady, Mrs. Ligschilder, wife of an Episcopal rector, staying with her husband in Munich, tells of what she saw there.

"It was very little," she said, "because I had my own three children to care for. But Munich was a manless city. In all the churches the women and children gathered twice a day to sing hymns; one could hear the bells calling them at all times. The conscription in Germany was more severe than anywhere else, and the suffering which is endured by families whose breadwinners are taken from them is unspeakable.

"Near my home was a family consisting, before the war, of the husband, who was a carpenter, and three small children, aged three, five and seven. They seemed very happy in their little stucco house, surrounded with flowers and arbors. The youngest fell ill with scarlet fever. At the crisis, when the mother was already taxed to the uttermost, came the call to arms. Fritz must drop everything and go. The few marks he earned daily stopped. Moreover, he must have warm blankets and socks to take to the war. With the little money at their command these were bought and Fritz left. Then the baby grew worse, and there was no money to send for the doctor. Alas! the little one died, and the stores in the house were all used up before kind German neighbors discovered their plight.

"Don't think the suffering people are left uncared for by their own neighbors. On the contrary, all the women better provided with funds are banding together in towns and villages to do what they can. They knit socks, make clothing, and send baskets of eggs and butter to the destitute. I saw the most beautiful spirit all over Germany. There are no rich or poor any more—all help each other."

The writer knows of a family living in a German village, composed, before the war, of an aged mother, two married sons and their wives, and a baby in each family. They were not living together, but were united by the close tie which binds a German household. Now, the sons are gone; the aged mother has been taken care of by relatives and the two young mothers are absolutely destitute. They have relatives in America who may help them later. How many German eyes are turned towards America for aid! With all that the government can do and all the kindnesses that neighbors can render, even to the limit of their own resources, there will still be countless cases of destitution like those cited above. Thousands of families will be rendered penniless as the "casualty lists" increase.

With the Missionaries

CHURCHES all over the country are calling attention to the conditions of the missionaries. The session of the Methodist Episcopal Church in St. Louis at Washington and Compton Avenues, has adopted a resolution enlisting the attention of the Christian people of America to the critical state which will soon exist among the missionaries of the world on account of the war in Europe.

Mr. McLaughlin has been secretary of the Philippine Islands Sunday School Union, giving such time as possible with other duties. He will now be a secretary with a salary, giving to the work of the World's Sunday School Association one-half his time, with full time of a trained Filipino assistant.

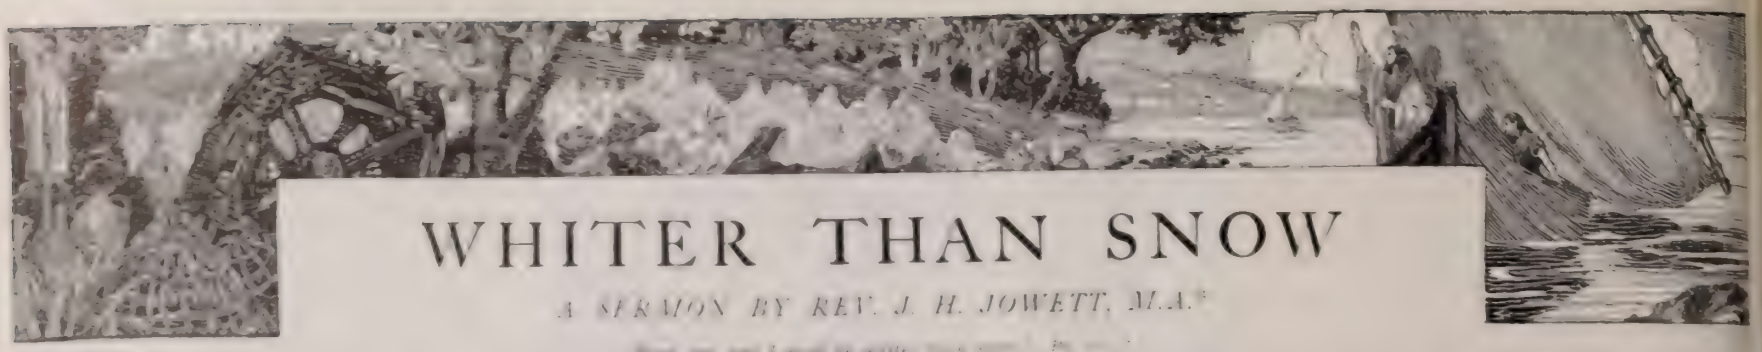
MISS JENNIE WHEELER, a missionary in Mexico, during the last six years at Saltillo, was protected in the English consulate. Of the twelve girls who should have graduated this year, six remained with her until the end, loyally pursuing their studies. So when she was forced to flee with her pupils to seek protection of the British flag, she gave them their diplomas, and now each of the six is teaching in the public schools, two in Saltillo, two in Torreon, and two in another city. Miss Wheeler had hoped to return by October at latest, but no time can as yet be set.



WHITER THAN SNOW

A SERMON BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, M.A.*

"Whiter than snow." What can be whiter than newly fallen snow? You have seen it in the first early light of the morning, before it has been stained by the world, and it has been so dazzlingly pure that it has made your eyes smart with the brilliance. It stretches out before you clean and white as an angel's wing. Then the city awakes. Its fires are lighted. Its chimneys pour out continuous streams of smoke. The atmosphere becomes thick and heavy and dirty. A thousand impurities pass into the white mantle, and leave the black impression of their unclean feet. It loses all its radiance. It becomes more and more impure, until at last it becomes the uncleanest of all things, dirty snow. In some places the whiteness is preserved longer than in others. The snow of the suburb has a more lingering whiteness than the snow of the city. The snow of the village retains its purity longer than the snow of the town. But even on the cleanest countryside, or in the cleanest hamlet, the snow gradually loses its luster, and becomes stained and soiled.

Now, the whiteness of the snow is our type and symbol of innocence. We speak and think of the little ones as innocent, and when we wish to express their purity, we use the figure of nature's purity, and declare them "white as snow." But the snow is soon soiled. Innocence is soon lost. The foul air of worldliness is breathed upon it, and its white luster is gone. And you know how fathers and mothers strive to keep their children in unsullied whiteness. They shelter them from foul breaths. They defend them from corrupt atmospheres. "If we could only keep them," they say, "as innocent as they are now, we should be satisfied!" Yes, but God wonders! We want them to remain white as snow. God wants them to become whiter than snow. We want them to remain innocent. God wants them to become holy. Innocence is purity by birth. Holiness is purity by choice. Innocence is original holiness. Holiness is tried and tested innocence. Innocence is greatness which has never had the chance of becoming badness. Holiness is goodness which has had every chance of becoming badness, and has remained lowly and stubbornly good.

Whiteness Is Not Weakness

When Jesus lay as a little babe in Simeon's arms, unspotted and sinless, his being was white as snow. When Jesus, as a man, returned from the wilderness, after having been tempted of the devil, strong and victorious, his character was "whiter than snow." God does not want his children to live in the insipid weakness of innocence. He does not wish the Christian life to be a prolonged infancy. He does not wish us to remain in the agreeable purity of innocence, but to go forward into the higher beauty of holiness. We have to rise into "the more excellent," into the radiant purity of a strong, noble, and positive life. There can be no stability where there is no conflict. There can be no strength where there is no choice. And there are the positive qualities which are sought for by our God. He wants us to be pure, and clean, and spotless, full of healthy, aspiring life. He wants us to have souls white, pure, and innocent, but he wants us to go forward to obtained substance. He wants us to have souls like the Master's, so strong in righteous purity as to be able to touch all impurity without being defiled. It is the white snow of holiness, the whiteness of aggressive strength, to which our Father calls us, a purity which is richer than gold.

And so our fathers and mothers cannot keep us in the whiteness of innocence. We must either become whiter as we become seasoned, fit for larger duties and put out into the world, and the tempter breathes upon us. Well, are we placed in that atmosphere, which does the Lord approve of us? What is the declaration of his will? Does he expect us to retire into seclusion? Yes, we have to keep our garments unspotted. His purpose is that we should pass through temptation and yet stand before him at last "not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing." The keynote of our religion is that we keep ourselves "unspotted from the world." Our Master wanted that we might be in the world, and yet keep ourselves unspotted from the world, and yet keep it, in the world but not worldly, and merely walking in innocence, but in the more perfect whiteness of holiness. Now, can that be realized? Do we practically believe that a man can keep himself unspotted from the world? Or have we dulled our consciences to the shaping of a compromise? Do we really believe that the heart can be kept robed in garments of white, or have we relapsed and found a kind of security in a diluted unbelief which confesses to itself: "No one can avoid being tarnished by worldliness. No one can escape its spots. They are like smuts in the atmosphere, and they fall and disfigure the whiteness of every soul." I think you will admit that there is the common refuge in which many Christians seek for justification in their sins.

Let us look the difficulty fairly in the face. Take the life of a business man in these days when there is a terrible strain in the procuring of daily bread. There is, in business circles today, an immense quantity of defiling pitch. Can any man keep himself clean and unspotted? Again and again I have heard the answer: "No, it is impracticable and impossible. A man must be spotted; he cannot keep himself white, and if he is wise he will go into the world with garments that will show spots as little as possible, garments as near the world's color as he is able to procure." So much for the business man's life. Now take a minister's life. "Ah, well sure, that is quite different. A minister does not come into contact with the defilements of competitive life. He is not beset with rivalry and deceit. He is exempted from the pitiless and corrupting warfare of trade. It is quite easy and possible for him to keep his garments white and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Well, I often think I would be a less worldly man in business than I am in the pulpit. What is worldliness? Esau is the supreme Biblical type of worldliness. And his worldliness consisted in this, that he sold his birthright for a mess of pottage, he sold his manhood for a dinner. That is the essence of worldliness today.

A business man is worldly when he sells himself to gain his bread. A minister is worldly when he sells himself to gain his bread. Ah, there are more breads than one! A minister can sell his honor to gain the bread of applause. He can keep back the truth from those on whom he depends for his living. He can be besmirched by flattery. He can be lured by a false ambition. He can be snared to preach in the pulpit what he does not live in the home. He is beset by innumerable temptations to worldliness. Can the Master's ideal be realized? Can he keep himself unspotted from the world? Can he keep his garments white? Can we appeal to experience both for the minister and the business man? I do not believe in that sweeping condemnation of business men, which proclaims them all to be a spotted race. There are men who in their business keep their hands clean and their hearts as tender as when they pray, or as when they talk to their little child. Social life with all its uncleanness is illumined by souls who walk in spotless white. The ministry is adorned by many men whose hands and hearts are unstained. There are souls who wear the white flower of a blameless life.

The Stainless Christ

But even if we had no such examples of pure and spotless lives to which we could make appeal, we have still before us the Word of God, with its clear demand for spotless purity. The Bible never makes a compromise. It never lowers its standard. It never comes to a man and says: "Your circumstances are peculiar. You are placed amid much defilement. Your atmosphere is corrupting. I will make a compromise. In consequence of your feeble range I will give you license to be slightly spotted and impure." No, no! It makes no such low agreement. High up it keeps its standard! Character must be kept unspotted from the world! Your garments must be white! There is need that we thus remind ourselves of our high calling. If God has called us to pure and lofty heights, he will give us power to reach them. I think we should gain a great deal by having larger beliefs in the larger possibilities of our life, and larger confidence in the power of our religion. One or two things we must believe and declare. We must believe that Jesus Christ can keep a soul in perfect purity, with garments whiter than snow. If we have not gained that purity, if our souls are spotted with worldliness, the weakness is not in our religion, the impoverishment is not in the resources of our Lord; the failure arises from the resources not having been seized upon and enjoyed. We are not straitened in God; we are straitened ourselves.

Now, we must remember that Jesus of Nazareth passed through our world unspotted, with garments whiter than snow. He lived our common life. He experienced our infirmities. He was beset with temptations, hedged about by worldliness. He felt the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. If he had had no intimacy with these lower reaches of our life, if he had soared above the dust and smoke of troubled humanity, and stood at last with white garments on some lone, lofty mountain summit, his incarnation would have been a mere pretense. I do not wonder at the whiteness of the snow which caps the head of Mont Blanc. I want to know if it will retain its loveliness in the streets of the city. And Jesus Christ came down into the low, common streets and lanes of human life. He came amid our pains, and sorrows, and sinfulness, amid our poverties and ambitions. He walked our muddy streets. He lived in our murky atmosphere, and he kept his garments white, yea, whiter than snow. I speak of him now as the man Jesus, our elder brother, all of whose resources are abundantly offered to us, and I ask, how was it accomplished, that in a corrupt and sinful world he kept himself unspotted from the world? I turn to the simple record of his life, and there is one outstanding feature which impresses me deeply from beginning to end.

The Atmosphere of God

I am impressed with Jesus' overwhelming sense of the reality of God's immediate and continual presence. To give that adequate illustration I should have to quote the entire life. "I am not alone; the Father is with me. The Father hath not left me alone." You feel the power of that consciousness all through his public ministry. He lived in the consciousness of his Father being ever about him like a surrounding atmosphere. That consciousness was his defense. His soul lived in it as in a pure air. Centuries before, Isaiah had spoken of the coming Christ, as one who should "draw his breath in the fear of the Lord." Will you mark that? It is rich in helpful meaning. It tells us how Christ drew pure breath even in an atmosphere of worldliness, how he kept his soul white amid surrounding uncleanliness. He drew his breath "in the fear of the Lord." His soul breathed in the fear of the Lord! His soul was set in the fear of the Lord, as in an atmosphere, and breathed it! But what is the fear of the Lord? The fear of the Lord is the consciousness of the Lord's presence. He who lives in the consciousness of the Lord's presence, lives in the fear of the Lord. That consciousness preserves and intensifies the soul's whiteness. It is unpolluted air for the breathing of the soul! Is not that what the psalmist means when he says that "the fear of the Lord is clean"? It is a clean atmosphere for the soul, an atmosphere which the soul can breathe in the most unclean surroundings, and escape from their defilement.

That is the atmosphere they breathe in heaven, "the fear of the Lord," the consciousness of the Lord's continual presence. That was the atmosphere of Paul's life. He tells us that he was "perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord." His soul was becoming whiter and whiter as he drew breath in the fear of the Lord. His soul was becoming whiter and whiter as he lived more and more in the consciousness of the Lord's immediate presence. So Christ carried about his own atmosphere. So did Paul. So do all true followers of Christ. We must carry about with us the atmosphere of heaven, if we are to escape defilement from the atmosphere of earth. We can breathe the air of heaven while we walk the ways of earth. We can be breathing the pure air of the hills of God. We can ever draw our breath in the fear of the Lord. We can live in the protecting consciousness of our Father's presence. The Father is with us; we are not alone! Ever fill your souls with that consciousness, as you fill your lungs

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, September 27. Mark 7: 9-13. "Full well ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition. For Moses said, Honor thy father and thy mother; and, Whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death: but ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, It is Corban, that is to say, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free. And ye suffer him no more to do aught for his father or his mother; making the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered: and many such like things do ye." By way of illustration the Lord now places a genuine command of God over against a tradition of the elders. God has made it the duty of children to support their needy parents. Not only the written law of God names this duty when it tells children to requite their parents, but this duty is everywhere recognized as a law of nature. God has implanted it in the hearts of men. But the Pharisees had issued this teaching: if a person consigned his goods to the temple treasury he was excused from helping his poor parents. (The temple treasury was called corbanas.) If they appealed to him, he need only say: What you ask of me is corban, that is, I have already disposed of it to God and the church, and the parents, from a superstitious fear of disturbing the religion of their child, must withdraw their request and prefer to die of hunger. This tradition was plainly begotten of the greed of the Pharisees, most of whom were priests. Now, these are the men who could not bear seeing the Lord's disciples sit down to meat before going through the ceremony of washing their hands. They are so heartless as to be willing to destroy a life rather than yield a point in their arbitrary rules. How many are still being deceived in our day by a pretense of godliness, where there is not even the shadow of godliness!

MONDAY, September 28. Mark 7: 14-16. "Hearken unto me every one of you, and understand: There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him can defile him: but the things which come out of him, those are they that defile the man. If any man have ears to hear, let him hear." When the Pharisees approached the Lord with their scruple about eating with unwashen hands, the Lord had dismissed the multitude for a moment. Now he calls them back, in order to guard his teaching regarding the laws of the church—to which all his hearers belonged—against possible perversion. He wants the common people to know his position correctly. The Pharisees will tell them that Jesus is a reckless disturber of the time-honored beliefs and customs of God's people. They will say to the people: "You know that unwashen hands defile the food. Defiled food further defiles the soul. Now, this Jesus thinks nothing of such defilement." To offset this report of his teaching, Jesus tells the people that he understands defilement very well; but the defilement by which a person loses his standing with God and his church arises from that person's depraved heart. The food that a person takes is in itself good; it does not defile the eater. But the wicked desires that come out of the heart, not only in regard to eating and drinking, but all such desires of whatever description, are indeed a defilement. The Christian mechanic who sits down to his frugal meal with the grime of his labor all over him is clean in God's sight, while the wealthy glutton may ask a thousand blessings and be scrupulously clean in body when he sits down to his sumptuous fare, and still be foul in God's sight.

TUESDAY, September 29. Matthew 15: 13, 14. "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch." The Lord's words to the multitude had been reported to the Pharisees, who professed themselves outraged by such wanton teaching. Their offense in turn was reported to the Lord by the disciples. Possibly the disciples themselves were not quite freed from their Jewish prejudices, and meant to indicate to the Lord by their report that he had created an unpleasant predicament for them by his unwarranted liberalism. Christ calms their fears by telling them: these Pharisees now look to you like trees of righteousness reared unto the praise of the Lord. But they are not of my Father's planting at all. Do not let their external glory deceive you. Not one of them will be transplanted to paradise. They will be plucked up and cast away. Changing the metaphor, he compares them, as on a former occasion, to blind guides, and warns the disciples not to follow their lead, that is, to have no respect for their assumed authority. They are to have nothing to do with them. If they bow to their decrees they will be ruined.

WEDNESDAY, September 30. Mark 7: 18-23. "Are ye so without understanding also? Do ye not perceive, that whatsoever thing from without entereth into the man, it cannot defile him; because it entereth not into his heart, but into the belly, and goeth out into the draught, purging all meats? That which cometh out of the man, that defileth the man. For from within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness: all these evil things come from within, and defile the man." The disciples had not grasped the Lord's remarks regarding the things that defile a man, and they made further inquiry about this matter. The Lord justly expresses surprise at their failure to comprehend him, because, through his teaching in the Sermon on the Mount and through their personal fellowship with him, they might have become familiar long ago with his view of the vast difference between formalism and genuine religion, also of what the Lord considered the seat and origin of every action. He now reiterates his teaching, and lets us take a peep into the moral depravity of the human heart as it is by nature. What a breeding-place of iniquity do we behold! Here are the agencies of defilement which are ever active in all men. Here is where the cleansing should begin. Washing hands, and all forms of cleanliness are good, but they are merely external. They do not reach the root of the evil. So is also the selection of food an external matter, and the whole process of nutrition and digestion something natural, that does not affect the soul. Whatever impurities there are in men's food and in their eating, the physical organism itself takes care of. The divine means of grace are not needed for that. But who will purge the heart of its contaminating contents of wickedness? None but he who sends the Spirit of the pure Christ into our hearts by the Gospel, which sanctifies us wholly.

THURSDAY, October 1. Matthew 15: 24. "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." By his journey into Syro-Phœnicia, our Lord puts a practical emphasis on his teaching regarding the things that defile a person. Intercourse with heathen was considered defiling by the Jews, and the woman whom the Lord meets on this journey was a heathen. Let the pure Pharisees now watch the Lord picking a human pearl from among the corruptions of paganism, and then revise their rules about purity. But what a self-contradictory answer does the Lord return to the appeal of this pagan mother, whose cries are causing a sensation and becoming painful to the disciples! If he had no mission except to the Jews, why did he come into this heathen country? Moreover, is not this the Christ who "came to seek that which is lost," and who invited all that labor and are heavy-laden to come to him? Yes, and the happy ending of this episode shows that the words in our text were not meant as an absolute refusal but as a test both of the woman's and the disciples' faith; for the Lord in the end grants the mercy which at first he seemed to deny. The pedagogy of grace embraces some hard lessons which the believer must master if he is to grow up into spiritual manhood. The children of God know that their Father in heaven loves them, even when he meets them in a cold manner or shows them a frowning countenance. They do not judge him by feeble sense, but take their stand on his word and wrestle with him for his blessing when he challenges the genuineness of their confidence in him and tries their patience and perseverance in prayer by delaying his answer.

FRIDAY, October 2. Mark 7: 27. "Let the children first be filled; for it is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it unto the dogs." Luther said that he would have been scared to death if the Lord had answered him as he answered this Canaanite woman. A plain refusal of help would have been disheartening enough to this distracted petitioner; but to behold her humble request spurned in words of contempt, we imagine, must well-nigh have struck a death-blow to her faith. And does not the Lord by calling her a dog endorse the Pharisees' view of the heathen, and rouse the woman's national antipathy against him who faces her as a Jew? No, this was neither the aim nor the effect of his reply. There was, indeed, truth in the charge of corruption that was raised against the pagans. God himself had denounced them. They had become brutes in sin and vice. It is the business of Christ as the messenger of God to uphold the righteousness of God's judgments against the people who have forsaken him. However, at the same time, Christ shields the heathen against the unrighteous and merciless judgments of men who were no better than the heathen. Besides, it is good for the sinner to hear his utter worthlessness stated in unsparing terms, just as an honest physician will tell a patient of his desperate condition. But now observe the astounding application which the woman makes of the Lord's answer. She accepts his judgment. The Lord is right: she and hers have no rightful claim on the paternal kindness of God. They have forfeited children's rights in his family. But as for herself, she will consider herself richly blessed with a poor dog's portion, if he will but let her have that. Thus the faith of a true believer rises from a crushing humiliation and discovers in the very terms of refusal a standing ground for a confident appeal for help. The slenderest promise is a sufficient guarantee to the child of God that his prayer will be heard.

SATURDAY, October 3. Matthew 15: 28. "O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Mark 7: 29. "For this say go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter." There is faith, then, even where unbelief seems to reign supreme. In the midst of his enemies, Christ occasionally holds aloft, for the dismay of devils and wicked men and for the joy of his adherents, trophies of his conquering grace. Not only faith, but "great faith" can be begotten by his mighty word in localities where all odds seem to be against such a result. And faith is the open sesame to the bounties of God. Its confident appeal strikes at the door of mercy that seemed bolted and barred with the sign of "No Admittance" hung out to deter applicants. The believer is sure that he has legitimate business with the Lord his Helper, and that he is not an intruder but a welcome guest whenever he comes and upon whatever quest he is engaged. He can abide the Lord's time for helping. Erstwhile refusals can be changed into joyous grants, if the believer remains humbly and trustingly at his task of knocking, and seeking, and asking. And when the gift is given, the great Giver accompanies it with a word of admiration that is worth more to the petitioner than the boon which he had asked. God, as it were, takes the believer in his arms and says: Not only do I give thee what thou hast asked, but I love thee for coming to me with thy wish.

TYRE, "THE JOYOUS CITY"

SEVENTH ARTICLE IN THE NEW TRAVEL SERIES

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

TOMB OF KING HIRAM, KING OF TYRE

STATUE OF ST. PAUL IN ROME

OF ALL the many journeys I have taken, I recall few more interesting than that which took me down the rugged coasts of Syria, from Beirut to Tyre. Every mile of the way is of historic significance. Over this highway of the sands and the seas, armies have marched and fleets have sailed. Phœnicians, Egyptians, Assyrians, Greeks and Romans, Crusaders and Moslems, Frenchmen and Englishmen, have contended for these coasts, and even in the present century, Italian dreadnoughts have bombarded these shores.

Even if no events of historic interest were connected with this coast, if we could forget the startling journey of Jonah, and took no interest in the spot where he is said to have been cast up on the yellow sand; if we cared nothing for the battles of Nebuchadnezzar, and the sieges of Alexander the Great, and Barbarossa, and Sir Charles Napier, our journey would still be one of unflagging interest, the natural scenery being so striking and unusual.

Close to the shore winds the road throughout the entire distance, now following a stretch of clear, smooth sand over which the waves of the Mediterranean, driven by the prevailing west winds, break continually; again working inland for a little way to avoid a rocky headland which juts far out into the sea, against which the white waves have beaten with little effect throughout uncounted centuries. On the other side of our road, and not far away, the mountains of Lebanon come down as though to bathe their feet in the salt sea waves, sometimes leaving only space wide enough for our "American wagon" to pass between the mountain and the sea.

About half way between Beirut and Tyre we pass the ancient city of Sidon; but now we must press on to the city which for centuries was one of the world's chief nerve centers. Tyre, the "Joyous City," the "Crowning City," as Isaiah calls her, when at the height of her glory and power he denounced her iniquities and foretold her destruction. Her first great king was Hiram, the ally of Solomon, and his reputed tomb today lies but a few miles out of the city. From her busy wharves were shipped the cedar and fir wood for the building of the first temple in Jerusalem. Even before this Hiram had sent carpenters and masons to help David in building his palace. Afterwards came Nebuchadnezzar, and for thirteen long years laid unavailing siege to the city, and was at last obliged to make a treaty of peace with her king. We pass over a few hundreds of years and see Alexander, with his invincible army, laying siege to this impregnable city. For months and months it defied his might and ingenuity, until at length, after innumerable repulses, he succeeded in building a causeway from the mainland to the island on which the chief defenses of the city were built, and the city fell a terrible victim to his long-baffled rage.

After the conquest by Alexander, Tyre never regained the magnificence and opulence, the luxury and insolence which Ezekiel and Isaiah rebuke, when "its merchants were princes and its traffickers the honorable of the earth, when the harvest of the Nile was her revenue and she was the mart of nations," as Isaiah poetically describes her glory. But what do we see today? As we approach this once mighty mistress of the world, we find her generous proportions have dwindled to the compass of a miserable Turkish town, scarcely more than a village, with some six thousand inhabitants crowded into narrow streets, behind forbidding walls. There are probably few dirtier towns in all Syria. The filth and offal of every household is thrown out into the streets, and one must pick his way carefully to avoid its contact. Outside the walls lie the sea-washed rocks once covered with splendid temples and palaces, now a reminder only of the truth of Ezekiel's terrible prophecy in which Jehovah says: "Behold, I am against thee, O Tyre, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth its waves to come up, and they shall destroy the walls of Tyre and break down her towers. I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her a bare rock; she shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea, for I have spoken it, saith the Lord Jehovah, and she shall become a spoil to the nations."

THE CITY OF TYRE AS IT LOOKS TODAY

Was anything ever more vividly and picturesquely accurate than this prophecy? It was uttered, let us remember, when Tyre was at the height of her glory, and queen the mistress of the world. Does any skeptical authority, who discredits Isaiah and Ezekiel by saying that this prophecy was not fulfilled, because, forsooth, this dirty little Oriental town still covers a small fraction of the site of the "Joyous City" of old. It is literally true that many nations came up against her like the waves of the sea, that her walls were destroyed and her towers broken down, and that the far greater proportion of her former magnificent area was scraped clean to the bare rock, where the nets of the fishermen are today spread.

Where now are the splendid breakwaters that Hiram built? Where the mighty walls and splendid pavilions that Alexander found here? There is, however, one reminder of the famous siege, for the causeway which he built is still in existence, broadened to a full half mile in width by accumulated sands until one can scarcely realize that Tyre was ever built upon an island.

There is also one oasis in this Moslem desert, for after threading a half mile of filthy streets, one comes out into the bright, clean compound of the British Syrian Mission, with its schools for boys and girls, another for the blind, its Sunday schools and little chapel, all presided over by Miss Lord, one of the most devoted and successful of missionaries.

But Tyre is of peculiar interest to us not because of the glories of King Hiram, or the conquering armies of Alexander the Great, but because some three centuries after his day a little man, probably dressed in a brown cloak, landed here on his way to Jerusalem, and here spent seven days among his friends and co-religionists before pursuing his further journey. In Paul's day the city was by no means so glorious as in the days of Ezekiel and Isaiah, nor had their prophecies then been fulfilled, as in later generations. It was a Roman city and was still more or less famous for its export of glass and of purple dye.

If we consult the story of this last great missionary journey of Paul, which occupies nine chapters, a full third of the Book of Acts, we shall find that, after his long tour through Macedonia and Greece and back again through Macedonia and down the coast of Asia Minor, after touching at various islands on the coasts, as Cos and Rhodes, he sailed from Patara, which our maps will show us on the extreme southern coast of Asia Minor, almost exactly opposite to Alexandria on the African shore. Instead of sailing thither, however, the grain ship on which he was embarked had a cargo for Tyre on the Syrian coast, and leaving the great island of Cyprus on the left, after a voyage of some days he reached the ancient and famous city I have described.

He was evidently not expected, for the original Greek implies that he had to seek out his fellow Christians. The ship made its way into the inner harbor, where the outline of the ruined breakwater can still be seen, though with every tide the waves dash over its huge foundation stones. During the seven days in which the ship was unloading her burden and taking on a fresh cargo, Paul had time to meet with the disciples more than once. Perhaps every day they met to pray together, while he exhorted them, few and despised as they probably were, to stand steadfast for the faith. These disciples had a premonition of Paul's coming troubles and urged him not to go to Jerusalem; but their forebodings seem to have had little effect upon the apostle. Perhaps he spoke to them such brave words as he had already spoken to the disciples at Miletus at the beginning of this momentous journey: "Behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there, . . . but I hold not my life of any account, as dear unto myself, so that I may accomplish my course, and the ministry which I received from the Lord Jesus to testify the good news of the grace of God." One most affecting scene occurred at the end of Paul's seven days in Tyre. Now he did not have to go about the city seeking out his fellow disciples. Though he had no one to bid him welcome, there were many to say good-by. In fact, when he departed, there was apparently no Christian left in the city, for we are told that "they all, with wives and children, brought us on our way till we were out of the city." Then in the simple words of Scripture, "kneeling down on the beach, we prayed and bade each other farewell, and we went on board the ship, but they returned home again."

What a wonderful little prayer meeting was this on the sands of Tyre! We picked out the spot where we thought Paul and the disciples might perhaps have kneeled, and tried to imagine the pathetic scene. Here was Paul, about fifty years of age, though he had already begun to think of himself as "Paul the aged," for doubtless his many journeyings and tribulations had prematurely aged him, especially in appearance.

Luke and Timothy were with him, and we are not certain what other early Christians may together have kneeled on that shore. We know, however, that all the Christians of Tyre were there—not only the men, but the women and children—kneeling together on the soft, clean sand, with the waves rippling on the shore and the ship standing in the offing. The background of the Lebanon Mountains was the same then as now. The great city, to be sure, has shrunk to the wretched dirty town of today; but it was not hard for us as we crossed this sandy beach to picture the scene, for the natural features of the country around Tyre remain the same from century to century.

How we would like to have heard Paul's prayer and Luke's and Timothy's, and the petitions of the humble disciples! Soon they rose from their knees, the men embraced each other, and kissed each other on either cheek, as is the custom today, while Paul and his fellow disciples rowed off to the waiting ship, and the disciples on the shore strained their eager eyes to catch the last glimpse of their well-beloved leader.

GALA DAY AT MONT-LAWN

"AND make a good story of it," added the editor, turning to other things. "Nonsen—!" . . . But I had best not say that to the editor. Still, it is nonsen . . . err—unnecessary to give me any such warning. A good story, indeed! No one who has seen Mont-Lawn, as I have, could write any other kind. Why, there are three thousand children to write about!

Speaking of figures, just pause a moment to consider a few in connection with that place! Ninety thousand delicious meals go smacking out of sight in one season; thirty thousand heaven-watched nights are slumbered snugly away; three hundred and ninety thousand hours, jammed to the last second with fun, are touched off like so many entrancing fire-crackers; four million shouts of laughter go rollicking up, up, up till they break in on the songs of the angels and add a note of human praise to the heavenly strain.

How do I get these totals? By multiplying each child's daily round by 3,000, the number who go to Mont-Lawn each for a ten-day treat. And even then I am omitting the trolley ride, train ride, ferry trip and stage ride, both going there and returning to the city, for each of the 3,000; and the unexpected shower bath each gets on arriving: brrrrrr; and I am not reminding you how those myriad hours are divided into daily excursions in the woods and byways of that charming country, into playtimes upon the ample outdoor apparatus, into rest-hours in the cool pavilions, into song sessions in the beautiful Children's Temple, into once-a-week afternoons of racing, hunting the red-cross bean, and impromptu entertainments by the children themselves. No time to mention here the sensation, that never loses its novelty, of flopping into a sweet, clean, cozy bed every night at seven. No time to mention a lot of delightful things. All that must be left to your imagination, while I write a good story about Mont-Lawn.

But before I begin let me say a word about William Milledge, the chef of the Home. He started to be an elephant, but changed his mind just in the nick of time, and so is an elephant in size only. And he never gets done smiling about it. He has a catching smile: all his busy helpers have caught it, every teacher who passes him has a pleasanter expression in consequence, the children are just so many bits of mirror all during their meals, each one reflecting that genial smile. It even leaps across from the kitchen of Fort Plenty to the kitchen of the Old Homestead where Mrs. Meyers is in charge, and adds its charm to a face already sufficiently endowed by nature. Best of all, that wondrous catching smile sets in and affects the disposition—and there you have a faint idea of the domestic staff that looks after the ninety thousand meals. Can you wonder that sunshine gets into the food itself?

HOME AGAIN

But about that good story. Just a word first, though. You know the children always line up and march into Fort Plenty to the tables. There are usually about three hundred or three hundred and ten, say, and first the boys march in double rank nearly to the building, then halt, separate into two lines between which the girls sedately march into the dining-hall, followed by the boys. As the boys marched past me the other day, I noticed a tiny girl keeping up in line, and started to ask her how she came to be with the boys, when my eyes, traveling along her arm to her hand, discovered it clasped tightly in the larger hand of a sturdy big brother possibly twelve years old.

WATCHING A MONT-LAWN FETE FROM THE OLD HOMESTEAD

And that is one typical incident of Mont-Lawn life—the faithful care big brothers and big sisters take of their little home companions when both are there at the same time. When you come upon such cases, either in the quiet ranks of the marching diners or amid the pandemonium of the playground, you suddenly understand that all these poor little "creatures" are verily boys and girls with loving natures and wonderful capacity for appreciating kindness. And instantly and forever their makeshift clothing, their so easily disordered hair, their just naturally dirty faces are forgotten, and you see instead "little ones" who might "come unto Him," but whom a hard fortune has thus far denied almost everything that boys and girls are entitled to.

Then it is you realize what a splendid work Mont-Lawn is. (I'll get to that good story presently.) Why, on Labor Day, the great final gala day of the season, you almost forgot for a bit that the three hundred children in a day or two would go back to comfortless homes, supperless beds in many cases, harsh conditions day and night, constant struggles against poverty's barrier to improvement. Quite a goodly company gathered to see the season's closing ceremonies, and the children furnished a most creditable part of the entertainment. A few of the teachers, practically over night, had drilled many of the boys and girls in charming folk dances given on the lawn, the possibilities in these children of New York's poor districts being very strikingly brought out.

First they had assembled as always in the Children's Temple, and there had sung as only Mont-Lawn children can. But that feature of the work is now famous. The venerable Dr. Babbitt, faithful visitor these past twenty-five years and more, and Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, stalwart friend of the Home, both spoke in exactly the right vein, and both bore tribute anew to the revered founder of Mont-Lawn, Dr. Louis Klopsch. Rev. James R. Morris, for years a missionary in Africa, held the young audience with folklore stories, and in the evening treated the children to a stereopticon talk, the first evening affair of the season. The day was perfect, and the great lawn never presented a more animated scene than it did that afternoon following the exercises in the Temple. The wish was persistent that the work could go on and on without interruption.

It has been a wondrous summer. And now three thousand girls and boys are bearing their hard lot a little more bravely for having been ten days at Mont-Lawn. Tired little lips break into smiles now and then at some reminder of Mont-Lawn days. Big brothers, while mothers work fast so as to go out and collect a few cents with which to buy an evening's meal, keep little brothers quiet by stories of Mont-Lawn: "Hey, Jimmie, don't you remember that day we had the ice cream? An' that other day in the woods, hey, Jimmie? Aw, Jimmie, quit crying; you ain't hungry, be you? Say Jimmie, maybe we'll get to go there next summer, too, hey, Jimmie?"

Well, next summer isn't such a long way off. But, glory be, those marvelous buildings at Mont-Lawn are not going to stand wholly idle until then. Something new is being done this year. A part of the institution is being kept up through October for tots under school age, and for these intervening days as many such children as possible will be given full-time outings at Mont-Lawn. There will be some change in routine; probably less than a hundred children will be taken at a time. Shorter days and cooler nights will necessitate new methods of handling the little guests. But a vast amount of additional good will be done during these early fall weeks.

The same executive staff will be in charge, some of the same teachers will be there. In short, there will be in a sense a concentration of the good things of Mont-Lawn upon a smaller group of children. And if the experiment turns out well, the regular season will in all probability begin at least one month earlier than formerly when next year rolls around.

But I had almost forgotten about that good story. The best place to begin is—but I declare, if I say anything more I will have to do it the way my mother finishes her letters, by writing around the margin of the page, which wouldn't do at all here.

W. B. ASHLEY.

The plan for the extra period is to select weakly children (not sick children) as far as possible, and give them a good bracing start for the coming winter. It is a splendid way of extending the good work of Mont-Lawn.

The benefits of Mont-Lawn may be doubled for all future years by the successful carrying out of this extension plan.

"REAL CHURCH" ON OUR BATTLESHIPS

BY CHAPLAIN F. B. THOMPSON, U.S.N.

DURING the recent disturbances in Mexico, and our occupation of Vera Cruz, all the chaplains in the United States Navy were ordered to sea but two. There were more chaplains at Vera Cruz while the fleet was mobilized here than perhaps have ever been together at any one time in the history of the corps. As far as can be ascertained, but one has been detached, so all the navy yards and training stations will have to be supplied with chaplains in the near future, with one exception. Many ships are still without chaplains, but it is believed that the addition of some twenty-six to the corps, authorized by the last naval appropriation bill, will be sufficient to supply each large ship in the navy and provide for all yards and stations as well.

With this assured increase, it looks as though religious interests in the navy were at their best, and that soon many of the personnel afloat will be able to enjoy a privilege long denied them: that of public worship. During our stay in Vera Cruz, there were perhaps 2,000 men in attendance at divine service each Sunday, while all the ships with chaplains were present in the harbor. Besides the regular service in the forenoon there were special afternoon services on ships not having chaplains, and with the marines ashore.

Some years ago, the captain of one of our battleships without a chaplain was visiting the captain of a battleship to which a chaplain was attached on a Sunday morning. He was escorted to the place where divine service was being held, and the visiting captain expressed his surprise that so many men were in attendance at the service; the captain of the ship replied, "I'll have you to understand we have real church on this ship."

Knowing something of the feelings of many fathers and mothers whose sons are in the navy, and of the desire they have that their boys shall have the advantages of religious worship and the influence of the church, I write to assure some at least, that real church is held on board the battleships of the fleet to which chaplains are attached, every Sunday, with few exceptions, and on ships to which they are not attached, from time to time when arrangements are made for them to visit ships for that purpose. With the increase in the corps, it will be but a short time, we hope, until all the battleships in the fleet will be supplied with chaplains to minister to the religious needs of the men.

Attendance at the regular service on board ship is optional, but the observation and experience of the writer is gratifying indeed as to the number present week by week, and in the interest shown by all. It is doubtful if the average church congregation

America the "Good Samaritan"

WHILE we write, the great war in Europe—the gigantic struggle that has bewildered the world—appears to be nearing a crisis. Not even a conservative estimate of the losses in battle is yet possible, but we know that the final list of the wounded and missing will be appalling. Rumors of mediation are being discussed in the capitals, with the probability that our government, as the only neutral Power available at the present time, may be requested to assume the friendly but difficult office of mediator. A day of national prayer for peace in Europe has been announced from the White House. Let us be unceasing in our supplications that the storm may soon break, and that the blessed sunlight of peace may again shine out over Europe and the whole world.

While cabinets and diplomats are explaining and protesting and attempting to justify the course of their respective governments in this suicidal war, the Christian people of America have an opportunity to enter the field, not as foes but as friends of the warring nations. As a great Army of Peace and Rescue, we can reach out and help the widows and little children whom the war has deprived of their natural protectors. This is a mission of Christlike kindness and blessing that should call out the heartiest sympathy of every father and mother in our own favored land. We have been spared the horrors of war. We owe it to God as a thank-offering to help these unfortunates across the Atlantic, whose lot might have been our own. We owe it also to Him who has enjoined upon his followers to comfort the widow and the fatherless. We owe it to the homeless and helpless sufferers because they are our brothers and sisters, children of the same great Father who hath made of "one blood every nation of men." And we owe it to ourselves as Americans, whose duty and privilege it is to demonstrate to the struggling millions that our neutrality is not that of indifference, but one tempered by humanity and kindness. The part assigned to us is that of the "good Samaritan" among the nations, and we should esteem the privilege as a very high and precious one, rich in blessing and potential in the cementing of international friendship and goodwill.

Let us, then, translate our friendship into deeds by reaching out hands of helpfulness, especially to those who seem to be well-nigh forgotten in the great struggle—the thousands who have been bereft of their breadwinners. These Silent Sufferers can be numbered by the tens of thousands. In their desolated homes with anguished hearts they are facing bitter privations. They need our help and they need it quickly.

While you count your blessings—and they are not few—do not forget to share them. To do something for others is one of the secrets of happiness. Send in your gift today to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund in aid of the widows and orphans, and have a personal part in the great work of body and soul-saving. Be assured that no matter how large or small your offering may be, it will be welcome.

A Nation's Prayer for Peace

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have a special interest in President Wilson's proclamation calling the nation to unite in prayer on October 4 for the restoration of peace in Europe, because they were represented in the many appeals which urged him to this step. Last week we published the telegram sent the President from the CHRISTIAN HERALD office, voicing the wish of the subscribers, particularly members of the Prayer League, that such a day be named.

Nothing can possibly be more fitting than that the people of this greatest nation now at peace, and on friendly terms with all the warring Powers, should unite in supplication to Almighty God to stay the hideous ravages of war and show the way to peace. And this united prayer, while it is offered in the interests of Europe, will react in untold blessings upon America itself. Such a spectacle as that of a whole continent convulsed in war must force the thought of multitudes toward God, awakening a longing that men would entrust their ways and plans to him. On one side the ocean a continent at war; on the other side a great nation at prayer. This turning of the minds and hearts of the people toward God, this supplication, not for self, not even for our own nation, but for other nations, should mark a new chapter in our own history, a chapter which shall mean new faith, new unity, new love, new power for righteousness.

The People and the Hymnal

THAT there is a very widespread popular demand for a revision of the hymnal is no longer a question of doubt. Responding to our invitation for a full expression of the views of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers as to the hymns that have been found most serviceable in the spiritual work of the churches, a very large number of letters has been received. Counted up to August 30, the vote showed these instructive results:

Total vote cast on all the hymns	9,339
Number of hymns voted on	1,731
"Jesus, Lover of My Soul" received	337
"Nearer, My God, to Thee" received	322
"Rock of Ages" received	315

The results of the voting will now be submitted to a committee of pastors, composers and hymn-writers, whose judgment we shall publish in an early issue.

The hymn-book of the immediate future should be one combining musical sweetness with dignified and reverent expression of a character suited to divine worship, and not merely to be regarded as musical diversion and entertainment. All the great hymns of the past that have stood the test of long years of service are of this character. There should be no place in the service of the church for doggerel music or vacuous, sentimental verse. We are appreciative of the fact that God often chooses strange instrumentalities to accomplish his purposes, and that even the foolish things of the world may be made to praise him. But to deliberately include as a portion of the divine service compositions against which reverence, musical taste, and common sense revolt, is unthinkable. As one composer writes us: "There are plenty of good hymns and tunes that the people love to sing. Why then use doggerel or trash?" This, we submit, strikes the true keynote for the revision movement. Moreover, the coming hymnal should be one that will be equally welcomed by all the denominations of the Christian Church.

A Municipal Food Board

HOPEFUL signs continue to be noted that the people are constantly growing more determined to take into their own hands the business of transporting and distributing foodstuffs. The suggestion has been made in New York City that a Food Board, or Department of Commerce, be established as part of the city's government to "gather data relative to production, sources of supply, how goods may be brought to the city, and what prices consumers should pay." Commissioner Hartigan is reported as suggesting that such a department be established, first as an emergency measure, but later to be made permanent.

The city is still providing municipal markets, and transportation companies are being asked to provide special facilities for farmers who wish to send their products to these public markets.

Since food means life, it is right that the people should have a dominant voice in the business of distributing the food they need. They are becoming more and more unwilling to tolerate "corners" and other maneuvers which push up to tragic figures the cost of life's necessities. Also, they are learning that they are quite capable of doing for themselves what they have, to their own disadvantage and distress, been allowing others to do for them. Other cities may be expected to act promptly upon this suggestion which has been made to the metropolis.

The "Atrocity" Collapse

IN EVERY great war, it is seemingly inevitable that there should be charges and countercharges of atrocities. It has been so in the present European struggle. Refugees, distraught over their misfortunes, have told tales of terrorism which grew with every new recital. Rumors, originating nobody knew where, were magnified and accepted by correspondents as actualities. During the early stages of the war, Germany was practically cut off from communication with the rest of the world, and thus had no opportunity to answer those detractors who represented her armies as resorting to barbarous methods on the field and in the treatment of prisoners and non-combatants. Refugee stories of outrage and brutality by German soldiers had free course, unqualified and uncontradicted, in the British and American newspapers, although to the thousands of Americans who have traveled in Europe it must have been incredible that the German character should have undergone a transformation which suddenly changed thoroughly disciplined troops into a horde of vandals.

Now, however, we have the whole fiction of German atrocities punctured and exposed by the voluntary attestation of five well-known American correspondents, including representatives of publications in Chicago and Philadelphia and the Associated Press. These gentlemen, on learning of the charges in circulation, made a special investigation covering two weeks, with the result that they found not the slightest confirmation of the alleged atrocities in Louvain, Brussels, Nantes, Lunéville and many other cities and towns, nor in the surrounding country anywhere within a radius of a hundred miles, the territory covered including many of the localities mentioned in the charges. They found not a single authenticated case of wanton mistreatment of prisoners or non-combatants. Even the refugees were unable to supply evidence in support of the "atrocity" stories. The whole structure of fiction collapsed under their unbiased investigation.

Not "Armageddon"

REV. DR. JAMES M. GRAY, dean of the Moody Bible Institute, in discussing the European conflict at the Bible Conference held recently at Mountain Lake Park, Maryland, declared that the present struggle has no connection with the battle of Armageddon. He said: "That the present war is not the Bible battle of Armageddon is demonstrated by several considerations: First, Armageddon is in Palestine and not in Europe; second, the object of the battle of Armageddon will be the destruction of Jerusalem after its reconstruction; thirdly, the attacking power in the battle of Armageddon will be the same countries as composed the Roman empire under the Cæsars. Russia was never a part of the Roman empire, neither was Germany, nor a part of Austria. Italy, France, Spain, Great Britain, excepting Ireland, were in the Roman empire. There must, therefore, be a different alignment of the nations before Armageddon can be fought. The war by no means indicates the end of the world. Before the end of the world, the Bible plainly indicates that we shall have a millennium of peace and righteousness. The war may indicate a nearing approach of the end of the present age, or dispensation."

Government Education for Children

AS THE result of thousands of appeals for advice on the care and training of their children from mothers throughout the United States, the National Bureau of Education announced the other day that it had established a Home Education Division. The objects of the bureau are to help parents in the home education of their children with reference to health, games and play, early mental development, and formation of moral habits; to interest boys and girls who have left school and are still at home, by directing their home reading and study, and to further the education of the parents in the home. There is a question as to how far Federal paternalism should go and not interfere with the local home or individual responsibility. But there can be no doubt as to the value of the Department of Home Education just instituted. The government has been a little backward in this class of work. It has spent much money and effort in seeking to preserve the health, lives and comfort of the animals on the farm; to improve the physical condition and value of horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, etc. Almost no attention has been paid to improving the condition or comfort of mothers and children. The new department of the Bureau of Education will do much to correct this omission. The value of the healthful instruction of children to the national life is recognized in this command:

And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. (Deut. 6: 7.)

The Deadly Tsetse Fly

RELIABLE statistics show that 200,000 native Africans have within the past eight years died as the result of sleeping sickness caused by bites of the tsetse fly. Death is pretty nearly certain to result in from six to eighteen months after the bite. The English Government is making an exhaustive study of this deadly insect. Professor Philip Austin of the British Museum has been out in Africa for the past five years experimenting with the pest. Whole villages have been burned out to stop its ravages. The fly is about the size of the ordinary house-fly, but its wings overlap. The proboscis, with which it sucks the blood from its victim, is longer than its head. A celebrated photographer of wild animals returned from Africa the other day with many trophies of his art, but he was unfortunate in having been bitten by a tsetse fly. He has put himself in competent surgical care, and though he does not feel comfortable in his situation, he expects confidently that he will escape the usual fate of such victims. It is to be profoundly hoped and prayed that this artist may be spared to a life of usefulness and happiness. The soul has been bitten by the deadly serpent of sin. Christ's blood is the certain antidote. The Saviour expressed this truth when he said:

And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. (John 3: 14, 15.)

Hidden Dangers in Sea

SHIPS totaling 136,000 tons have sailed from the ports of the world during the past three years, never to be heard from again. With them have been lost more than a thousand lives. Commander J. Foster Stackhouse, of the British Naval Reserve, is in Washington, seeking American co-operation in clearing the seas of hidden dangers. Commander Stackhouse is preparing to start on a seven-year ocean-charting expedition. Secretary Daniels offered whatever assistance his department could render. There are hidden rocks and hulks of sunken ships in the sea of life, on which human barks strike and sink with loss of precious souls. Paul makes this reference to such disasters:

Holding faith and a good conscience, which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck. (I Tim. 1: 19.)

Arrested for Telling Fortune

A WOMAN who described herself as a "minister of the White Rose Society," which she said was a religious organization, was arraigned in the courts of one of the large cities the other day on the charge of being a fortune-teller. She was suspected of being a fraud, and a woman detective was placed on her track. The detective had her fortune told, and the "minister of the White Rose Society" charged her two dollars for the prophetic service, and was promptly arrested. The magistrate put the fortune-teller under a bond of $2,000 to keep the peace. Professional fortune-tellers have preyed on the credulity of the public from the earliest times. They have been usually shrewd enough to picture a rosy future for the subject, and the fee charged has been cheerfully paid. P. T. Barnum's estimate of the gullibility of the general public is not far from the truth. In all the callings of life there are pretenders who take the people's money without rendering the slightest equivalent. They are the incompetent professional men, the tradesmen that with misstatements induce the purchase of wares without value, and the fakirs of one kind or another. It was a woman fortune-teller who made much money for her master, whose evil spirit Paul cast out, which act led to his arrest, chastisement, and imprisonment.

And it came to pass, as we went to prayer, a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of divination met us, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying. (Acts 16: 16.)

FREE MUNICIPAL MARKETS INSTITUTED

THE outburst of public indignation at the pushing up of the price of food products, upon the pretense that the war in Europe required it, prompted some of the cities of the country to establish free open markets where the gardeners and farmers may bring their products for sale, and the citizens may come and purchase them. New York City early in September instituted four municipal markets, one at the Manhattan Bridge, one at the Harlem Bridge and Third Avenue, one at the Fort Lee Ferry convenient to the New Jersey farmers, and at the Queensboro Bridge, easy of access to the Long Island farms. The markets were small at first, but they have grown immensely in the wares offered, and in the people buying. Many rich persons in their automobiles patronize them, and send their men and maids with baskets on their arms, and the plain people hail the new plan as a great blessing in being able to get the necessaries of life at a reasonable figure. Thousands of bushels, and thousands of wagon loads of vegetables fine and fresh have been bought at prices mutually satisfactory to seller and buyer. Butter, eggs, meat, and fish in great quantities, singularly fresh, have been procured at reasonable figures. Other free markets will be established in the Boroughs of the Bronx, Queens and Richmond. It looks as though many cities of the country would imitate New York's example. Newark, N. J., has several successful free markets just instituted. It will be well if this experiment will rebuke those miserable creatures who want to make money unjustly out of the misfortunes of others. The free markets of Palestine and their popularity are suggested by Christ's words: "They love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogue, and greetings in the markets." (Matt. 23: 6, 7.)

Government Buys Mount Washington

THE great central peak of the Presidential Range, Mount Washington, the grandest of the White Mountains, has just been purchased by the United States Government and made a part of the Eastern National Forest Reserve. The purchase includes not only the most central peak of Mount Washington, but its flanks and spurs, and the other Presidential peaks of Clay, Jefferson, Adams, Monroe and Franklin. It adds 35,000 acres to the 133,000 belonging to the National White Mountain Preserve. The ultimate plan is to have a national park of 600,000 acres. The Eastern National Forest Reserve will furnish water-power for practical industries for generations, and will afford untold pleasure and benefit to the bodies, minds and souls of the people who shall visit it. The mountains of Bible lands were the scenes of events most tragical. On one of them mid fire and smoke the law was given to Moses; on another the lawgiver fell asleep in death. On one Christ was transfigured; on a hill outside the city gate our Lord was crucified; from a mountain he ascended into heaven. Jesus loved the mountains he had made, and often repaired to them for rest, for meditation and for prayer. He selected one of them as his pulpit for the delivery of his inaugural, which was to form the character and determine the destiny of the race.

And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain; and when he was set, his disciples came unto him; and he opened his mouth and taught them. (Matt. 5: 1, 2.)

Fatal Toadstool Mistake

AS THE result of mistaking toadstools for mushrooms, Jacob May and William Ogden, of Lafayette, Ind., are dead, and George Bauer and Michael May were sent in a dying condition to the hospital. Michael May gave a party at his home, and what was thought to be mushrooms was served as the greatest delicacy. An hour after the dinner was over four of the diners were prostrated, two of whom died in an hour. Every year numbers of persons are killed by the deadly toadstool, taken by mistake for the delicious mushroom. What tragedies there are in the moral realm by the innocent substitution of things that are poisons for those that are healthful and lifegiving. An intimate friend is thought to be all that could be desired, but there is an evil element concealed which makes the companionship deadly. A book seems to have the warmest sentiment, and the highest motive, and yet there lurks within it a virus that makes it a deadly toadstool instead of a luscious mushroom. A man by mistake put some wild gourds into the pottage while it was cooking

And it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out, and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot. (II Kings 4: 40.)

G. A. R. Convention

WHILE a great war rages in another land, the peaceful forty-eighth national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic was held in Detroit, Mich., during the week closing August and beginning September, with Commander-in-Chief Gardiner in the chair. Routine business was transacted, and Comrade David J. Palmer of Washington, Iowa, member of the Eighth and Twenty-fifth Iowa regiments in the Civil War, was elected commander-in-chief for the coming year. Washington, D. C., was unanimously chosen for the encampment for next year. The roll showed that 11,187 members had died during the year. The report of Adjutant General Oscar A. James showed that on January 1, 1913, there were 180,213 members in good standing in the G. A. R. and that on January 1, 1914, there were 171,335. A committee was appointed to frame a bill to be introduced into Congress, retaining veterans in the government employ irrespective of their age. The convention also opposed any change in the flag. It will be only a few years till the last veteran of the Civil War on both sides of the conflict will be gone. The drummer boys and youngest that carried the musket are all of them old men now. Of them it can be said:

Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season. (Job 5: 26.)

THE PATIENT IN ROOM L

BY ANNIE HAMILTON DONNELL

RUTH ANNIE breezed in upon her mother's quiet and rather wistful meditations. Ruth Annie was the embodiment of vivid and lovely young life; from the bronze head of her to her slender little feet she was delightful. People said of Ruth Annie that she took after the Dunns instead of her father's folks. Some of the people, reminiscing agedly in chimney-corners, remembered her mother's looking a lot as she did now—just as bright and delightsome and breezy, they said. Ruth Annie's mother sometimes had a vision of herself as a recreated, a young and blithesome Dunn again, and the vision allured and drew her if for no other reason than that in it she folded her hands and rested. They were not folded now, but hurrying frantically upon Mrs. Supervisor Craven's tea-gown.

"Oh, Mother!" burst from this daughter-of-delight in the doorway. The light fell on the flushed young face and Esther Tilden read but one thing in it.

"You've got it, Ruthanny! I knew you would—I knew it! Oh, my land, six hundred a year!" She might not need to be a Dunn again. Rest—a little rest—seemed already in her reach. The fussy tea-gown of Mrs. Supervisor Craven slid to the floor.

"Ruthanny, seems too good to be true!"

"Mother, what are you talking about? Do you mean the high school place? Of course, I haven't got it yet. Mr. Craven only wanted to see me about substituting, while Miss Simmonds is away. Oh, Mother, what made you go and—and interrupt my soul?" The words were an actual wail. Suddenly the light in Ruth Annie's eyes seemed to deaden and die out, but it presently flared again, but more feebly.

"I've been to the missionary meeting. That returned lady from Africa spoke—oh, beautifully! We drank in every word. Mother, right then and there it came to me what I wanted to be." She crossed over to Mother's sewing-window and stood, a straight and inspired young creature, looking through the scarcely impeding substance of her frail little mother to that far Dark Continent she had been hearing of. It was not Mother she saw, nor the elaborate gown Mother had picked up again from the floor. She saw beckoning black hands, and her soul nodded "I'm coming" to them.

"They need me, Mother. She told us their awful need. I must learn to be a nurse, and go to them. Mother, don't you see? You wouldn't have me refuse my call?"

To Esther Tilden the poignancy of that moment was like a blighting shock—an oversweep of pain. She had been aging before, but from that moment she was old. She could not speak, but there was no need. The thrilled young voice ran on in her ears—Ruthanny's singing voice, her voice-of-delight.

"And to think if I hadn't gone to that meeting to-night I'd have been willing to teach school all my life! A civilized, happy, pandered school! Perhaps I'd never have known I had a soul. Mother, when can I begin to learn to be a nurse? Those poor sick creatures can't wait much longer! Emileen Addis is going to begin right off, I don't know but to-morrow. She's always meant to be a nurse, but not a missionary one till to-night. She says her guardian will consent, so she needn't wait till she's of age. I needn't wait, Mother—you won't ask me to wait?" The pleading of the voice-of-delight! Mother heard it through the tumult of her pain. And suddenly the soul of Mother caught hands with Ruthanny's soul and went with it toward those beckoning black hands. Mother's soul kept up. Perhaps there had never before been a real hero-Dunn. At this moment in awful travail one was born.

"I'll have to finish off Mis' Craven's dress first, but it won't take long," was Mother's answer to Ruth Annie's plea. "You can ask Milroy Mead to get my old Saratoga down, out o' the attic, in the morning. It needs tinkering up, but Milroy's handy with tools. You can be emptying your bureau drawers while I'm finishing this dress."

"Mother!" Ruth Annie fell on her knees and plunged her head into the soft heap on Mother's lap. "Mother, you're so good! But I knew you'd be—I knew! I told Emileen Addis so. It won't cost very much, Mother, just for a uniform and—things. Emileen says they pay you something almost from the very first. It will take three years, that's all."

All! Esther Tilden caught her breath. Were three years a short time to reconstruct her plan of life, hers and Ruthanny's—to work and live alone, and live alone and work—to get ready for all afterwards? Would all afterwards be short? Yet in spite of all these startled, dreadsome thoughts it did not occur to Esther Tilden to assert her mother-rights over this headstrong young daughter of hers. Bewildered and almost terrified though she was, it only "occurred" to her how beautiful and holy an ambition the child's was. She, too, saw far visions of supplicating black hands outheld to her Ruthanny. She thought to herself with a thrill of fervor that if she were young, like Ruthanny and Emileen Addis, she would go to that needy country a nurse its unnursed sick.

But she was only old. Fifty-three seemed th to her threadworn, fragile little body. Her pa must be sacrifice—just sacrifice. But the sacrifi —dear Lord of lonely mothers, the sacrifice Ruthanny! In very anguish of the thought s fought it back and forced herself to turn to preser practical needs.

"Ruthanny, you just fill the kettle, dear, a start the fire up. We rushed supper so for you go to the missionary meeting, I guess we didn either of us eat much. We'll have some toast a cocoa now, to make up. I can't stop a minute, but can eat sewing."

She was used to "eating, sewing," in a dain crumbless way of her own. Esther Tilden did things daintily. Ever since her young husba had faded out of life and left her to face the wor with a tiny baby in her arms—ever since that s time she had sewed—sewed. It sometimes seem that she would die sewing. Without her thimb her finger felt cold, she said, and mercy, if she w to fold her hands she'd drop to sleep!

She had sewed the mortgage off from her litt house; she had sewed away all the accumulat debts incurred by the young husband's long sic ness, and by several sicknesses since then of Rut anny and herself. She had sewed Ruthanny throu grammar and through high school. Now here, b fore her, lay new tasks for her willing, courageo hands. There was no danger of her thimble-fing growing cold.

"There's a little top-o'-the-milk in the yello nappy, if you tilt it up easy—don't put it in my cu though, for goodness' sake! I hadn't ought to dri rich cocoa, you know."

"Well, you won't!" laughed Ruth Annie, tiltin easy. "There aren't six drops of 'top' here! Mothe how can I make toast and cocoa to-night? Ever thing is so different now."

Yes, everything was so different. Over M Supervisor Craven's tea-gown Mother gently sighe It seemed the blood of her heart she was stitchi into those seams rather than scarlet silk. T cocoa, when she sipped it daintily, tasted burned her, but it was the taste of burned sacrifices on altar rather than Ruth Annie's scorched milk.

"It won't need—why, much of any money to tal the hospital course," Ruth Annie was thinking she drank her own cocoa; "Mother won't have spend a lot, I'm thankful for that. Just a fe

OCEAN GROVE'S BANNER SEASON

THE "banner season of Ocean Grove" concludes this month. "Not in years has the tide of spiritual life been as high," says Dr. Aaron E. Ballard, the veteran leader who in spite of his nearly ninety-four years of age presided at the closing sessions. "The preaching has been of unusually high standard and effectiveness." Officials of the Camp Meeting Association report that this has been one of its best years financially, because of the enlistment of several new members who have shown remarkable aptitude for "attending to financial operations in a spiritual way."

During the season, which opened Sunday, June 21, with a sermon by Bishop Berry, the congregations assembling in the Auditorium have been addressed by Dr. David J. Burrell, of New York; Dr. Charles H. Wishart, of Chicago; Dr. Russell H. Conwell, of Philadelphia; Dr. Cortland Myers, of Boston, Dr. George C. Peck, of Baltimore, and other distinguished preachers.

During the camp meeting Thomas Harrison, "the boy preacher," was among the popular speakers. Dr. C. E. Guthrie, of Wilkes-Barre, delivered the morning sermon on the last Sunday. The young people's meetings were led alternately by Dr. C. L. Mead and Dr. W. H. Morgan. Mrs. Theodore F. Henderson, wife of Bishop Henderson, of Tennessee, sang at many of the services.

"The holiness meetings this summer, in charge of Dr. and Mrs. Henry Wheeler, assisted by Mrs. Mabel Q. Stevens, of Florida, who gave an evangelistic address every evening, and Colonel S. L. Bringle, of the Salvation Army of New York, were especially helpful and aided very materially in improving the spiritual life of Ocean Grove," says Dr. Frank L. Wilson, of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, Yonkers.

Dr. Wilson, as vice-president of the Camp Meeting Association, has rendered particularly active service during the season, putting his shoulder under the heavy burden of directing affairs in general in a way to relieve Dr. Ballard from mental as well as physical fatigue and over-exertion. Dr. Wilson also had charge of the Beach Meetings at the North End, and conducted an adult Bible class of 2,000.

The last Sunday was a notable day. Bishop Oldham stirred the great audience, packed into the vast Auditorium, by his sermon on "When Christ Becomes Real." Dr. Oldham admonished his hearers not to be content with a phantom Christ. "Let the visualized Christ be real to you," he said. "Mere outer knowledge of the Bible is often accompanied by a vanishing Christ. A close literal or historical study of the Holy Gospel with a penetrative mind avails a man nothing unless he reads with a hungry heart."

Dr. Charles M. Boswell, of Philadelphia, conducted the after-meeting. "The after-meeting," said he the next day at the closing service of the season, "is just as efficient as ever. The twentieth century sinner is no different from the old time sinner, and the twentieth century Gospel is no different from the old time Gospel. At every after-meeting held this season, some souls have received the baptism of the Holy Spirit. And the Sunday nights have been mountain peaks. Not only have there been conversions, but from many church members the rust has been removed and the machinery put once more in running order."

So great was the attendance at the closing Sunday evening service, that an impromptu overflow meeting was held in the Arlington Hotel by Rev. Charles H. Madison, of Poughkeepsie, resulting in many conversions.

Ocean Grove is early astir on its closing day. At 5.45 there is a sunrise consecration meeting in the Tabernacle. At 6.45 there are "family devotions" in the Auditorium. Both of these services were led by Dr. Ballard, who at the 9 o'clock hour baptized about thirty children. Then followed reports from the various department leaders, concluding with the raising of money to enlarge the Young People's Temple. In almost no time, over $1,100 was pledged.

The Camp Meeting ended with its time-honored institution, the annual "Walk Around Jerusalem," when, with members of the Association in the lead, the congregation, singing "We're Marching to Zion," forms in procession and marches to and through the various buildings of worship and around the canopy-covered model of the city of Jerusalem.

"I never saw so many aged sain in all my life!" exclaimed an enthusiastic onlooker as the line moved slow in the autumn sunshine, threading i way along the avenues, up and dow back and forth, in and out the doo of one sacred edifice after anothe Silver crowns were the prevailin fashion among those who participat in this strangely impressive parad "Onward, Christian Soldiers," sa the voices, "marching as to war" while feeble steps faltered as the obeyed. "In the Sweet Bye-and-Bye rang out another group, while fac which already reflected Heaven's glo shone happily. "When The Roll Ca Sounds Up Yonder" brought out dee Amens from many who anticipa answering that call before anoth camp meeting time. On and on the marched and sang, returning to t Auditorium to close with "God B With You Till We Meet Again Many a cheek was wet with tea many a heart beat quick with symp thy, those of the aged with glorio anticipation, those of younger fo with pangs of heartbreak, as t wavering voices rose to heaven chorus:

"Till we meet again, till we meet again,
Till we meet at Jesus' feet."

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

GOVERNMENT AFTER "LITTLE" BUSINESS, TOO. Thirty-one food dealers were recently indicted in Washington by a Federal grand jury, charged with conspiracy to fix and maintain prices above normal. Attorney General Gregory said that under existing conditions, capitalization of misfortune by arbitrary increase of the price of foodstuffs is so peculiarly reprehensible that, whenever convictions are obtained, the government will refuse a fine or civil remedy and will insist upon sentence of imprisonment. Officers of the Department of Justice are actively scouring the country for similar offenders.

CHICAGO MUST WIPE ITS FEET. The women's clubs of Chicago have organized a Women's Street Cleaning Bureau, and will ask to have the city's street appropriation turned over to that organization, with a view to putting the money to some other use than, as alleged, to provide soft berths for political henchmen.

FRIENDS MOURN THEIR LEADER. The Friends' General Conference, held at Saratoga, N. Y., was clouded by the death of Henry W. Wilbur, whose funeral took place in Philadelphia, September 9, during the sessions. Dr. O. Edward Janney was made secretary of the Society of Friends in Mr. Wilbur's place, temporarily. The conference discussed woman suffrage, but failed to endorse it. Rehabilitation of the society and extension of the organization were urged.

A WISE BOARD OF EDUCATION. Class-room discussion of the war or of the nations engaged in it has been forbidden principals and teachers in Philadelphia, even at the loss of any courses that might lead too close to the frontier of the forbidden topics. It is hinted that a temporary discontinuance of the study of geography and history may result from a literal observance of the new rule. Possibly for once a Board of Education finds favor with the pupils under it.

WITH THE ARMY IN COLORADO. On September 5 President Wilson addressed the miners and the operators in the Colorado coal regions where Federal troops have for a long time been stationed to preserve order, urging a three-year truce, and the observance for that period of certain principles and rules proposed by the Commissioners of Conciliation who, by the President's direction, thoroughly investigated the conditions there after the recent small civil war. Among the provisions are the enforcement of the mining and labor laws of the State (it is claimed by the miners that parts of these laws are dead letters); striking miners not found guilty of unlawful conduct to be guaranteed work; the creation of Grievance Committees for the adjustment of disputes, and of a permanent Federal commission to adjust disputes which those committees fail to settle; no mine guards other than necessary watchmen to be employed; full-time running of the mines; and early withdrawal of Federal troops.

AT THE OFFICES OF THE Board of Foreign Missions of the Baptist Church, news is received that all the Baptist ministers in Germany able to carry arms have been called to war, and the churches are without pastors except in a few instances where the ministers are too old to be in service. It is claimed that there are between 30,000 and 40,000 Baptists in Germany, and nearly 2,000 ministers; all are called to the colors who are able to carry a musket. In Russia the Czar has granted religious freedom to the Baptists, about 25,000 in number, in recognition of their service, and many of the Baptists are running hospitals in the Baltic provinces.

ACCORDING TO A LETTER received recently by Dr. A. Woodruff Halsey of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, the conditions in Syria are becoming more complex. Since the Turks have been mobilizing their army, calling out all men between 19 and 45 years of age, Beirut has been in a state of terror. All banking business is stopped and an eyewitness declares that on August 15 15,000 people fled to the mountains in fear of being called into service or of being massacred.

SCHOOL BEGINS AGAIN IN MEXICO. The brief vacation taken by the Mexican factions has come to its inevitable close, and fighting is now once more on full time. The enrolment is not yet as large as just before the last war term closed, but the principals have their respective truant officers out rounding up the delinquents. The thing is in earnest, too. Heavy fighting between Constitutionalist forces and ex-Federals is reported from several quarters. Zapata is keeping Mexico City in terror; he has cut the main water supply. Famine has attacked many sections, due to the failure to harvest the crops and to the long cessation of railway traffic. The United States Government has removed the border embargo on arms, in the interests of the Constitutionalists, presumably. The plans of Generals Carranza and Villa have not been made known.

BUTTE, MONTANA, STILL ON THE MAP. The threatened destruction of Butte by the miners who have split the Western Federation of Miners in two, has not followed the establishment of martial law there, and on September 9 the twelve companies controlling the copper output had the temerity to notify the ten thousand and more miners who recognize either the Western Federation or the Butte Mine Workers' Union, that open shop will be maintained in future, and miners may belong to one or both or neither union; it will make no difference to the employers. Wages and hours established under union contracts will continue for the present. Butte had won fame as producing one of the finest examples of labor contentment and efficiency under union methods. But in June it became apparent that the Federation had lost its hold on the majority of its members, and could no longer live up to its contracts with the operators. The revolt has bred bitter hostility between the remnant of the old union and the cohorts of the new. The open shop order has not as yet acted as oil on troubled waters.

WIRELESS TELEPHONES TO TRAINS. The Union Pacific Railway announces that as a result of nine years' experimenting it is about to instal a part wire, part wireless, telephone system by which verbal communication can be maintained with running trains for a distance of 100 miles from a station, thus immensely simplifying the control of the right-of-way and the direction of affairs in emergencies. By the intercar connection, passengers may make dining-room car reservations without the labor of walking the whole length of the train and back again, only to repeat the trip at the dinner hour: not the greatest of the new system's advantages, perhaps, but interesting just the same.

RAILROADS ENCOURAGED TO HOPE. Railroad executives have made so convincing a presentation to President Wilson of the needs of that business as affected by the war's influence upon traffic that he has pronounced their case a good one and assured them of his active support in securing relief where feasible through government agencies, also urging the public to give favorable heed to the railroads' plea for larger revenues. In this connection may be mentioned the reported purpose of the House Ways and Means Committee to include a three per cent tax on railroad freights (levied on shippers and consignees, not the carriers) in the bill to provide for the expected $100,000,000 deficit in customs receipts, due to the war. That tax it is estimated, will produce $55,000,000; $33,000,000 more will be raised on land, and $9,000,000 approximately on domestic wine.

A GOOD WORK CEASES. The press of September 11 reports the closing of the George Junior Republic at Freeville, N. Y., by order of the trustees, September 1, due to the heavy falling off in contributions to the work. The annual budget amounts to about $60,000 a year, and there is at present a deficit of about $17,000. This institution, which has become world-famous, was founded in 1899 by William R. George, and has entertained visitors from all over the globe. The affairs of the republic during the past year or two would seem to indicate that the enterprise may not be resuscitated, at least for the present.

NEBRASKAN COVERS CANAL ROUTE BETWEEN CALIFORNIA AND NEW YORK. On September 5 the American-Hawaiian Steamship Nebraskan arrived in the port of New York from San Francisco by way of the Panama Canal, the first merchant ship to cover this route, and bringing the first cargo of California fruit, it is said, that ever reached New York by an all-water route. Commercial organizations of New York City sent formal greetings and congratulations to the ship's officers and crew and to the steamship line. The Nebraskan was enthusiastically cheered as she steamed to her berth in Brooklyn.

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS SOCIETY will send a big steamship abroad with physicians and nurses, and stocked with supplies for their beneficent work. The 10,000-ton liner Hamburg has been chartered and renamed the Red Cross. Over $100,000 has been raised by the Society to finance this first division of its European war relief corps, Miss Mabel Boardman, head of the American Red Cross, giving her personal direction to the raising of the present fund and the dispatch of the relief ship. Preparations aboard the Red Cross had been made with a view to the ship's sailing the early part of the month. It was discovered, however, at the last moment that the crew contained many Germans, some being naval reservists. The discovery led representatives of Great Britain and France to object to the ship's touching at ports of those countries, and in consequence the departure of the Red Cross was delayed until other seamen could be substituted for the Germans. The destination of the ship is Falmouth, England. About one hundred and twenty-five nurses and over thirty doctors are in the expedition. They go well supplied with surgical and medical necessities, prepared to minister to the needs of the wounded in the name of humanity and without regard to nationality or to the rights and wrongs of the war that has called them to duty.

STRAYED WAR ITEMS. The almost complete elimination of newspaper correspondents from the zone of activities is one of the notable features of the war. A number of well-known American writers who were sent by their papers to report the war from first-hand observation succeeded in accompanying the German army for about two weeks, and were held as prisoners a portion of the time under suspicion of being English spies. They finally were permitted to make their way across the Dutch border. This is the party of correspondents whose signed statement was published at the close of our last week's war story.

There was a sputter of peace talk during the week ending September 12, based on alleged utterances of one or more foreign ambassadors in this country, but it was stated in official circles that no real ground existed for expecting any move in that direction by any of the warring Powers. Efforts to bring about mediation proceed, however, and powerful influences are being enlisted by church bodies, peace societies and others.

A considerable fleet of American merchant marine is being rapidly created under the new shipping registry law, which modifies conditions hitherto prohibitive to foreign-built vessels. A total of six freight-carrying ships had either hoisted the American flag, or given notice of their intention to do so, on September 11.

Shoe manufacturers and dealers in a conference at New York and representing three national associations, gave notice that while as yet the war had not seriously affected the business, an advance in the cost of raw materials was unavoidable and would result in an increase in the retail prices of shoes. Manufacturers rely on foreign sources for the bulk of their calf and kid skins and chemicals used in the tanning process.

RUINOUS FLOODS IN CHINA Severe floods are destroying life and property in the Shangtung Peninsula, China (across which the Japanese must march if they would invest Tsingtao), one small stream, 15 feet below the town, having risen until it poured through the gates, causing great damage; many natives were rescued by missionaries, but many others were drowned. The homeless and destitute now number thousands, according to reports.

MULTITUDES HOMELESS AND STARVING

THE PITIFUL APPEAL OF THE WIDOWS AND CHILDREN OF EUROPE'S WAR FOR AMERICAN AID

SUBSTANTIAL progress has been made during the past week in organizing the work of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the European War. Steps have been taken looking to the appointment of Central Relief Committees in France, Belgium, Germany, Austria and Russia, and it is confidently expected that full committees will soon be at work with facilities for reaching points where effective service can be rendered.

Co-operating with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the great body of Protestant churches in America will be asked to take up the cause of the widows and orphans of the war in Europe and present it for the sympathetic support of their people. On the Continent, a number of Protestant evangelical pastors and laymen in the various countries will give the movement their active aid, co-operating with the Relief Committees in their labors among the sufferers. Among these foreign workers, Pastor Charles Wagner (author of The Simple Life), and Rev. Dr. Dickie, of the American Church in Berlin, will probably be identified with the operations of the committees in their respective countries.

There are indications even at the outset that the CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund will be welcomed by benevolent Americans as affording an opportunity for special Christian service of the most direct and effective sort. That this feeling is widespread is evident from the letters already received, which come from New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, Vermont, Illinois, Minnesota, Pennsylvania and other States.

A friend in Welland, Ont., sends $10 for the War Relief Fund, being the first Canadian subscription. We trust these will be the forerunners of thousands of other contributions in aid of the stricken families who are the innocent victims of the war.

A writer estimates that there are already over a million orphans in Western Europe, including France, Belgium, Germany and England, made fatherless by the war. Assuming this to be a conservative estimate, if we include not Western Europe alone, but all the European countries involved in the sanguinary struggle, this appalling figure will be more than doubled. What of the orphaned children of Russia, Servia, Austria, who must be added to the roll of the fatherless? And what of the hundreds of thousands of sad-faced mothers who will listen in vain for the familiar footsteps of those dear ones who are sleeping in crowded graves on the battlefields?

These are the pitiful domestic tragedies which the war has brought to all classes alike. The return of peace, when it does come, may gladden others; but it will not lift the burden of sorrow from the homes of bereavement.

Then there is the great army of the homeless—those whose earthly belongings have been destroyed by the terrible war. These are doubly victims. Shelterless and foodless, they are to be found in almost every locality where the destructive march of the armed hosts has left its trail of blackened ruin. Shot and shell and the torch have taken everything from thousands of families. Driven from fireides and pleasant surroundings, they have suddenly become wanderers, tramps, Ishmaelites.

A correspondent of the London Daily News writes from Boulogne, giving this realistic picture of war and suffering:

"St. Quentin was raging with battle. In a dense wood between St. Quentin and La Fere a number of people had taken refuge—peaceful peasantry for the most part. The wood was raided by cavalry, though the white flag was hoisted on the outskirts. The undergrowth was dry as tinder, and the order was given to fire it. In a few moments the wood was a huge, raging fury of flame, roaring madly. A priest told me this tale in the gray hours of dawn this morning. 'What happened to the people there?' I asked. 'What happened? God alone knows!' and tears rolled in torrents down his face."

Mme. Vandervelde, wife of the Belgian Minister of State, writes of the condition of the peasantry of that devastated country, and pleads for the sympathy of Americans. In her appeal she says:

"It is for help for devastated homes, the fatherless families of those whom this terrible war has left houseless, who will be left without rooftrees, without money to rebuild them, and—and all too often—without sons or husbands to work for them.

"I am the bearer of a letter from our well-loved Queen. The countryside is strewn with the dead and dying. Thousands and thousands of people have nothing in the world left, not a roof over their heads, no money, no clothes, nothing, and no chance of earning a living of any sort.

"The sight of the poor refugees streaming into Antwerp from Louvain and Malines, women with babies in their arms, their older children clinging to their skirts, men wheeling their decrepit fathers in wheelbarrows or helping along a crippled brother or son, all knowing they will never again see the houses or cottages they and their parents were born in, is more pitiable than any words can possibly express."

There are still a number of American women in Paris, and they are doing splendid work in aiding the widows and children of soldiers who have died in the war. Among them is Mrs. Herrick, wife of the American ambassador. Some of these golden-hearted ladies have even parted with their jewels to do this Christ-like work. Many French families have been reduced to poverty by the war, but all who have the means are uniting under the inspiring example of the Americans in giving aid to those mothers and children who have lost their breadwinners. They sew garments, they cook, they comfort, they give lavishly and lovingly all they have, be it much or little, to those who have nothing, and who, if not befriended now, must perish. These conditions are duplicated in the war zones of all the countries involved. Wherever one goes along the highways, he meets little groups of the homeless and hopeless peasant folk, almost always women and children, with occasionally a few aged men. In many cities food is scarce and mounting toward famine prices, but to the homeless price is not a consideration, as very few of them have any money.

Many of the Americans stranded abroad in Holland, Belgium and Germany, though in trouble themselves, have generously helped the war refugees. In Holland provisions are becoming scarce and the people are substituting rice flour for wheat. But Holland is neutral and has not felt the effects of the war economically to any extent, compared with those countries where the great struggle has been consuming the visible supply of foodstuffs at a frightful rate.

If the war, which is not yet eight weeks old, should be prolonged, famine is certain in several countries. It is already feared in Austria. A London Daily Mail correspondent writes that the empire is nearly bankrupt; trade is at a standstill; the harvests are going to waste and Vienna is menaced by actual famine. The only bread is the rough army bread and it is scant even now. Vast masses of the working and starving are scattered throughout the country for whom nothing can be done. There is neither work, food nor money.

Belgium is little better off. The government has granted seventy-five centimes (fifteen cents) a day to soldiers' wives and twenty-five centimes (five cents) for each soldier's child, but there are thousands who are unprovided for. A Paris correspondent (Sept. 9) writes that hundreds of the refugees and the homeless sleep in the fields at night and by day the roads present a cavalcade of misery that is indescribable.

Says another Paris correspondent: "Women and children in the last stages of exhaustion are tramping to Havre from all sorts of places in Normandy. Those who find rough beds of straw and waste to sleep on at night regard themselves as fortunate. Streams of carts laden with household goods line the highways.

THE PRESIDENT'S CALL TO PRAYER

By the President of the United States of America:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, Great nations of the world have taken up arms against one another and have put many millions of men into battle from the counsels of statesmen have not been able to save from the horrors of war; and

Whereas, In this, as in all things, it is our privilege and duty to seek counsel and grace of Almighty God, humbling ourselves before him, confessing our weakness and our lack of any wisdom equal to these things; and

Whereas, It is the especial wish and longing of the people of the United States, in prayer and council and all friendliness, to serve the cause of peace:

Therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do designate Sunday, the fourth day of October next, a day of prayer and supplication, and do request all God-fearing persons to repair on that day to their places of worship, there to unite their petitions to Almighty God, that, overruling the counsel of men, setting straight the things they cannot govern or alter, taking pity on the nations now in the throes of conflict, in his mercy and goodness showing a way where men can see none, he vouchsafe his children healing peace again and restore once more that concord among men and nations without which there can be neither happiness nor true friendship nor any wholesome fruit of toil and thought in the world; praying also to this end that he forgive us our sins, our ignorance of his holy will, our wilfulness and many errors and lead us in the paths of obedience to places of vision and to thoughts and counsels that purge and make wise.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this eighth day of September in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fourteen and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-ninth.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President:

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN,
Secretary of State.

LOVE'S ANOINTING*

Rich Mary, Poor Judas*

By Amos R. Wells

MARTIN LUTHER coined the phrase, "Amen folk." He meant folk that say "So be it" by their lives and not merely by their words—folk in dead earnest, folk that mean business.

Mary of Bethany was one of these "Amen folk." The alabaster flask was very beautiful and costly, but she gladly broke it. The spikenard ointment was very expensive and precious, but she gladly poured it out on Jesus' head. It was the most valuable gift she could make, probably, but she thought not of its value, only of the value of him to whom she gave it.

The story is told of a little boy who loved a canary very much. But his mother was sick, and the singing of the bird disturbed her, so he gave the bird away. "How could you part with it?" asked his wondering mother. "Didn't you love it?" "Yes," the boy replied, "but I love you more." So Mary loved Christ far more than any possession; and we must be like her if we would enter Christ's kingdom of love.

Mark does not tell the full story; perhaps Peter, his informant, missed the most significant part of Mary's deed. But John, the disciple nearest Jesus, did not miss it. It is he who tells us that Mary bent over Christ's feet, anointed them, and wiped them with her hair.

Then, Mary pointed out to us, very quietly, the way of blessing. "I used to think," says F. B. Foster, "that God's gifts were on shelves one above the other, and that the taller we grew in Christian character the easier we should reach them. I find now that God's gifts are on shelves one beneath the other, and that it is not a question of growing taller, but of stooping lower, and that we have to go down, always down, to get his best gifts." Down like Mary, bent in humility, love, and joyful self-surrender at the feet of our Redeemer.

To think that this lovely deed should arouse criticism! It shows what a base passion is fault-finding. Have you ever listened to a true art-lover as he estimated the paintings in a gallery? He did not go around pointing out the false drawing here, the inharmonious coloring there, the poor composition of this picture and the ungraceful lines of another. No; everywhere he found something to praise. A little crowd gathered about him, seeing beauty through his eyes. His was the true criticism, which is appreciation. Such a critic in the realm of character would find many a Mary in every neighborhood, women of gentle heart and loving deed, humbly pouring their ointment over the feet of the Master. But the fault-finding spirit will never find them.

Judas, the thief, traitor in his heart and soon to be traitor in his life, led the fault-finding. "What a sinful waste of money," he cried, " with so many poor in Bethany who need it!" and many were fooled by his hypocrisy.

What did Christ mean when, in answer to this fault-finding, he used the oft-quoted expression, "Ye have the poor always with you?" Did he mean that poverty is fated to continue in the world? That the dream of comfort and plenty for all is an empty dream? By no means.

I have just been reading about President McKinley's cabinet. Every one of those eight men had been a poor boy. Every one had worked his way up. Only two of them had a college education before beginning their active life out in the world. Yet there they were, powerful officers in charge of one of the world's greatest nations.

In that sense we may well hope to have poverty always with us—not the hard, grinding, hopeless poverty of Palestine, born of oppression and robbery, but the poverty of honest independence, leading, by the pathway of open opportunity, over the hills of brave struggles, to the city of success. With this poverty, thus conquered, every poor disciple of our Lord is rich; while every rich man, if he has the heart of Judas, is poor indeed.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

We [illegible] to be more than we are; but we must work up to the limit of our [illegible], if we are to win the Master's smile at "Well-done!" And the remarkable thing is that the greater things that it and work up to the limit of your fences this year, you will be able to push them farther out next year, and further the year after. Responsibility is proportionate to capacity, but the ability is always going forward, calling for greater response. Remember that Jesus counts value by devotion, not by strength, brave women and beautiful souls. The three months back to David's time who drew water from Bethlehem's well, and thus gave women and their reward equally with prophets, psalmists, and heroes of the faith. Do beautiful things for Jesus, your will, with [illegible] what and how, as you can, as best you [illegible]. Martha blamed Mary for neglecting to help her; but Mary's mystic love saw more than, and must have wafted fragrance even on the cross to her Lord.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Prof. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

[Editor's Note: Some weeks ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD announced that Dr. Franklin E. Hoskins, of Beirut, Syria, would begin in the autumn a series of weekly notes on the Orientalisms of the Sunday school lesson. The [illegible] war, with the consequent interruption of [illegible] for passengers and mail matter, had made it uncertain whether Dr. Hoskins's manuscript would reach us in time to begin his notes with the first October lesson, the beginning of the new quarter, as had been planned. But just in time the manuscript arrived; notes for the second lesson are already in hand, and we are hoping that the [illegible] will be kept up month by month, for these "Lesson Echoes from the Holy Land" to reach the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School. Meet Dr. Hoskins has resided for 22 years in Syria, where he is a noted [illegible] of the Presbyterian Mission, professor in the Beirut Theological School, editor of the Mission Press, and also editor of the great modern Arabic Bible which is in course of completion. Of this great work, the New Testament is already in print and the Old Testament ready to the end of the Book of Lamentations. Dr. Hoskins, concerning the history of this translation, wrote in 1912: "If the lives and eyesight of the present workers are spared and we can maintain the present average of about thirty to forty completed electrotypes every working month, the remaining half of the Old Testament should be ready by the middle of 1915, which will then complete the task of over seven years on the fourth edition of the First Loot Reference Bible."

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are to be congratulated in having the opportunity, through Dr. Hoskins's pen, of catching every week a real breath from the Orient and of hearing, in their homes and Sunday schools, these "Echoes from the Holy Land."]

THE use of unguents applied to the hair and skin as an act of toilet is an ancient custom especially in connection with cleansing and bathing. Among the Jews is was an almost daily practice to make use of oils and perfumes. Luxury led to specially scented oils often as a sign of joy, discontinued during the time of mourning and resumed as a sign of favor and prosperity. The anointing of guests on arrival or at feasts was customary in Christ's time. Simon's failure of hospitality in this respect is commented upon by our Lord. (Luke 7: 46.)

Anointing as a remedial agent was in use among the Jews before the time of Christ. It was practiced by the apostles, recommended by James, mentioned in the parable of the Good Samaritan and used as a type of God's forgiving grace healing the sinsick soul. The probability is that any ordinary oil (olive oil) was referred to and used. In later times it took a different form and meaning. The oil was supposed to owe its virtue to its consecration by prayer or the peculiar way in which it was obtained or prepared. The bones of martyrs, the pictures of saints and carefully prescribed forms of service all entered into the preparation of this holy oil of ecclesiastical usage.

Some modern dwellers in the Orient, perpetuating the ancient customs in an ignorant and depraved form, too frequently omit the bathing, which in ancient times always preceded the anointing, and only the perfumes remain. Certain perfumes have been almost wholly monopolized by certain undesirable classes of people. The brighter, cleaner survivals of the ancient custom are met with in the daily life at weddings, where guests are met with showers of rose leaves, or sprayed with rose water, cologne water, orange flower water, while more costly ointments are applied to the hands and face.

Attar of roses is sold today in Damascus against its exact weight in gold and at least 150 pounds of rose leaves are required to produce less than an ounce of the highly valued essential oil.

The use of orange flower blossoms at the Anglo-Saxon wedding is a kindred custom to the ancient Oriental usage. The anointing of the head of the guest or a bride or a king was common, but the anointing of the feet was an unusual, rare and special tribute.

Love for Christ

By Arthur H. Howland

AGAIN we have a narrative which reveals the very heart of the New Testament. We have found that the key-word of the New Testament is Love. But love, without further explanation and direction, will not suffice. The love that will change and save the world is the love that is poured out gladly and freely at Jesus' feet. This is not sentimentalism. It means that the only sufficiently powerful force in the world for the spiritual and moral tasks which must be done is the force of love for Christ.

Jesus said at another time to this same Mary: "One thing is needful." And only one thing is needful—that is an ardent, personal, self-sacrificing love for him. It has been men like Paul, who could say: "The love of Christ constraineth us," that have done most for humanity. Paul, Luther, Wesley, General Booth, Bishop Taylor, Bishop McIntyre—men like these—pouring out their heart love for Christ, have poured out their life-strength for the suffering and needy, and have set in motion currents of thought and feeling which right social and economic wrongs and bring salvation to multitudes for body, mind and soul. Lecky, the great English historian, states that the tremendous economic reforms of the early nineteenth century in England can be traced to the influences of the Wesleyan revival.

Judas was no true friend to the poor. He would not have given them the "three hundred pence." His heart was wrong.

The best and sweetest and surest way to bring about the economic changes which must be wrought out in America would be through a revival of the "old-time religion." Read the notes in the Epworth League lesson on Christ's statement in verse 7: "The poor ye have always with you."

THE LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

Conducted by JEANE L. LEOHY, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Superintendent, Part II

WE CONSIDERED in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for September 2, the special books required for the superintendent's study; the organization of his school; the duties in regard to officers and teachers. We come now to his work for the pupils themselves.

5. Subsidiary.

[illegible]

(b) He should [illegible] the school [illegible] and [illegible] school [illegible] at all.

(c) He should [illegible] the Orientalisms [illegible] including the [illegible] a special [illegible] in a school [illegible] a school [illegible] and [illegible].

(d) On the Orientalisms a [illegible] and [illegible] should be sent [illegible].

(e) He should [illegible] and [illegible] should be planned for by the school officers as [illegible] and [illegible] in the annual expenditure of the school.

(f) Equal [illegible] should be made for the [illegible] which finds in the school asking that Christ be acknowledged as Saviour and Lord, and to the early [illegible] of belief the [illegible] should be [illegible] [illegible] as a duty and privilege.

6. Organization and Session.

(a) [illegible] [illegible] material [illegible] in the session's [illegible]. Here the [illegible] should [illegible] the following classes or departments: Beginners (3 to 5 years old); Primary (6 to 8); Junior (9 to 11); Intermediate (12 to 14); Senior (15 to 17); Adult (over 18).

(b) At the close of each school year [illegible] will be planned at which some of the pupils will be received. This may occur on a Sunday or week day. Certificates should be presented and parents and friends invited.

(c) The session, wherever possible, should be by departments to fit the grouping to the ages of the scholars. This is often difficult where but one room is used for the school.

(d) Brief drills form an important part of the superintendent's work. Exercises in these drills may be found in The Superintendent and His Work, chapter 8.

(e) Plans for making the Sunday school [illegible] power to [illegible] in same book, chapter 9.

6. Committees.

The number and nature of these will depend upon the size and needs of the school. These committees are good training points for young people in practical service. The superintendent should meet with these committees where possible and assist them to plan their work. In an active school the work these committees can do covers the broad field of the social and recreational life. Social Service, Employment, Missionary, Temperance, Visitation, Purity, Publicity, Welcome, Special Days, etc.

These lines of service could be grouped under a few committees if the number of members is limited.

7. Home and Community.

(a) Effort should be made to enlist every member of the home in some department of the Sunday school and to promote the Home Department and family prayer in the homes.

(b) A systematic community visitation should be entered out to reach "The last one."

(c) Parents' classes, and a mothers' or parents' association with a monthly meeting, is a practical way of promoting a closer relationship with the home.

(d) The Sunday school should be constantly advertised to the community through a weekly article in the local press.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Trust Verse*

I WILL trust. I will not be afraid. The Lord Jehovah is my strength; he is my song; he is my salvation."

There is a striking sequence in these ree words: strength, song, salvation. od is our strength, whether we alize it or not. Even if we do not on to make him our song and our lvation, he is still our strength. "In m we live, and move, and have our eing." He is "the God," as Daniel old Nebuchadnezzar, "in whose hand ur breath is." Every heart beat is ne effect of his personal power. The ysterious vigor that shoots from our rain along our nerves and makes our uscles move is his gift. The power ith which our minds do their think- ng is his.

Now, we can misdirect that power; e can forfeit it by neglect or mis- se; we can fail to apply it to other aculties of our nature. But all the ime the strength is there for us. 'his amazing strength that is in the everlasting hills" and the abundant cean, and the whirling planets, and he infinite stars, is at our disposal, ot only for our bodies and minds, but or our souls. "Ye shall receive ower," said Jesus. "God is our efuge and strength." "He has not iven us the spirit of fear, but of ower, of love, and of a sound nind." "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength." "The Lord Jehovah is my strength."

What shall we do about it? A good thing to do is to sing about it, o rejoice about it, to count on it, to trust it. To sing is a simple thing. But it means that we are really beginning to trust ourselves to the power; that our souls are touching those vast currents of God's infinite spiritual power and making them available for our own work.

You have watched the machinist connect his lathe with the factory's power. Wheels, pulleys, shafting, belting—all are flying about, but his machine is still. There is no power in it. Suddenly he moves a lever; the belt slips over upon his own pulley; his machine comes into motion; the power of the unseen dynamo or engine has come to his lathe to do his work for him. So it is with God's power and our souls. It whirls on all about us; it is actually in our bodies and our brains, but it needs that slight act of trust to connect it with our souls. While we are singing we are apt to be trusting. And as we trust, God becomes our salvation.

"He also is become my salvation." That is, his measureless strength has passed through our song and through our trust, to the actual task that we have on hand. The task of overcoming this temptation; the task of taking this message to a soul or a congregation we would help; the task of understanding this bit of divine truth; the task of attaining new ground for our souls—for their actual necessities. God has become our salvation. He will save us from sinning, from failing, all because we stopped fearing, and began to trust in his strength.

Fear is almost the deadliest enemy of the soul; its ally is doubt. They are like paralysis, like heart failure; they touch the very sources of our strength.

Notice the word will. "I will trust, and not be afraid." Refuse to fear; refuse to doubt. Refuse to stand idle by your lathe, wondering why it is not producing beautiful and useful results. God is your strength. Begin to sing; begin to trust. And for all your needs he will become your salvation.

* "TWELVE GREAT VERSES. X. THE TRUST VERSE." (Consecration Meeting.) Isa. 12: 2. B. Y. P. U. and Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, October 4, 1914.

A Song of Companionships*

OUR song this month is about companionships. The song is divided into two parts: one happy, the other sad. The first part sings of a happy man, for "blessed" means happy. Happy is the man who does not walk with the ungodly, nor stand with sinners, nor sit with scorners. He has a real delight; it is in the law of the Lord.

It is hard to keep a law one does not love. But when one loves a law the keeping of it is easy, and the further study of the law delightful. That is the great secret of the Bible, particularly of the New Testament. This is what Jesus meant by saying that his yoke is easy and his burden light. This is what Paul meant by insisting that Christians are not under the law; not only that they are free from the ceremonial law, but, so far as the moral law goes, they are not slaves of it, but friends. They love to keep it. Jesus summed it all up in saying: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends." His salvation changes the heart, so that it delights in God and in his ways, and in fellowship with those who live nearest him.

Such a man is like a tree planted. He does not waver. You know where you will find him a week, a month, a year, a decade from now—still delighting in the law of God. But he is not planted where things are dry. Happiness and delight are still abounding; he is planted "by the river of water."

He is also fruitful. Companionships, such as those he has chosen, help his success. The power of God's law is in his life. "Whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." Even if success does not take the shape of things like dollars, or fame, or other matters that make success as the world reckons, he shall prosper in soul wealth, in bringing spiritual riches to others, and in storing up eternal treasure in other worlds.

Now the sad lines. People who choose other sorts of companionships, people who do not like God and his laws and his folks—they do not stand like trees that are planted; they are blown away like chaff. Nor shall they stand in the judgment; they have nothing to stand on. Their way shall perish.

Companionships! Choose then carefully. This lesson comes near the beginning of the school year. What crowd will you be identified with? Don't be a prig, but let it be understood that you do not like things that are "off color"; that things which are ungodly, sinful, and which spring from scorn of what is pure and holy are distasteful to you. Choose companions who will help you most. Then be the kind of a person who will make the choicest and most helpful companion for others.

* "A SONG OF COMPANIONSHIPS." Ps. 1. Epworth League Topic for Sunday, October 4, 1914.

REV. DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN recently conducted a conference on evangelism at Montreat, N. C., the summer Mecca of the Southern Presbyterian Church. At the last general assembly, this denomination voted to make evangelism the keynote for the present year and the Montreat Conferences set apart an entire week for evangelism.

Dr. Chapman from the beginning won the hearts of the people. He hoped the rising tide of sane evangelism would eliminate the professional from the coming church. He insisted that evangelism is not a method, but a spirit. He never entered a series of meetings with a prepared program.

Among the ministers and the elders, as well as among the women and young people, there was many a token of a strong desire to carry home the spirit of evangelism. Many of the leaders of the denomination expect Dr. Chapman's work to be a large factor in making this the year of largest ingathering in the history of the Southern Church.

"Cook could you spare me a little, please?"

Artful minx! Bound whatever happens, to have her fill of this tempting and satisfying dinner-course—

Campbell's Tomato Soup

And right here is the moral for every solicitous mother—anxious first of all for the physical welfare of her children.

Their normal appetite, nine times in ten at least, is a safe guide to the food which does them good.

The genuine wholesomeness of this perfect soup is what makes it so irresistible to the unspoiled appetite of young and old.

Do you and yours get the full advantage of this fact as often as you might? How about dinner today?

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

HERE is more of the best kind of answered prayer news: "Some time ago I asked prayer that the children of Mrs. S. join the church. Four of them have done so. E. B. P., Rogersville, Ohio."

Mrs. E. C. writes from Clayton, Tex.; "I wrote the Prayer League asking an interest in their prayers for physical and spiritual blessings. I feel that I have been spiritually blessed. There has come to my soul a sweet peace." Mrs. P. B. writes from Greely, Col.: "I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer by sparing the life of the physician for whom I requested prayer some time ago." Mrs. B. B., of Portland, Ore., writes: "Some time ago I sent a request for prayer that a friend of mine find employment. Now he has a good position." A. C. H. writes from Chillicothe, O.: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in helping us out of financial difficulties in a very unexpected way in answer to prayer." E. A., of St. Clair, Minn., writes: "The request sent in that property might be disposed of has been answered." Mrs. A. R. L., of Sandboro, Ind., writes to thank God for the restoration to life and health of an unconverted friend, the fulfilment of a cherished plan, and the pardon of a prisoner for whose release prayer had been made.

A Kentuckian writes from London: "I am an American over here in this awful war, but the Lord has answered my prayers." W. W. writes from Port Townsend, Wash.: "My home was surrounded by forest fire. I prayed to God. He gave me assurance that all was well and my home was saved." F. B. of Goldsboro, N. C., writes: "I want to thank the members of the Prayer League for their kindness to me in offering prayer to God in my behalf. I have been greatly relieved. I do not suffer any pain now. I do feel so thankful to God."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

N. M., Kean, Mich.; M. W., Sisson, Calif.; A. J. S., Escanaba, Mich.; M. A. N., Burlington, Mich.; Mrs. A. H. C., Amboy, Minn.; Mrs. G. L. B., Canal Winchester, Ohio; A. F. S., Washington Mills, N. Y.

Specially fervent prayers are asked by the editors for two or three sad friends who have requested the League to pray that death might come to end their sufferings. Read the discussion of this pitiful request in this week's issue of the Mail-Bag; then pray earnestly that God will surprise these dear friends with altogether unexpected relief from their distresses and with beautiful gifts of divine gladness.

The attention of Mrs. S. F. G., Mrs. M. McC., and J. L. H., is also directed to our Mail-Bag. Their letters to the Prayer League have been answered in that department in recent issues.

Special prayers are asked by C. J. for a young lady who has been fitting herself for missionary work who is dangerously ill and who, at the time the letter was written, appeared to be growing worse. H. B. E. asks prayer for a dear friend whose mind is clouded. Mrs. M. McC. for relief from strange fears.

Mrs. M., who wrote some time ago, asking special prayers for the mental restoration of her son, writes again to urge the members of the Prayer League to continue earnestly in prayer for his recovery. He was a young man of exceptional gifts and training and was ready to enter the ministry when this affliction overtook him. Let us not forget this broken-hearted mother's plea that her son may be restored to a life of usefulness. A friend of an aged and afflicted couple writes, unknown to them, to ask special prayer that their son may be delivered from the drink habit. She describes their sorrow, and relates that at times the mother, who is nearly blind, sits up all night waiting for his return. She urges that the members of the Prayer League pray "without ceasing" that this young man be saved. Mrs. Y. W. asks prayers for a young man and his wife. The man is an unwilling slave to drink and the young wife has been disappointed in her plans for teaching during the coming winter. Mrs. M. E. D., who asked prayer for the recovery of her grandson from tuberculosis, writes that he has been encouraged to learn of these prayers. He has a young wife and one child. Prayers are asked for his complete recovery and that he will be guided in seeking health. Mrs. A. D. S. has been an invalid for seven years. Her daughter, who has devoted her life to caring for her, is now ill, and her husband also. She asks earnest prayers for the restoration of their health. Mrs. M. G. asks prayer for spiritual blessing and special guidance for her household in domestic difficulties.

E. B. P. asks prayers for blessing upon the Lutheran Church at Rogersville, Ohio; Mrs. W. A. L., for outpouring of Holy Spirit upon revival meetings at a village near Tate, Tenn.; Mrs. C. T., for the young people of the church at Lanark, Ill.; Mrs. G. L. O., for outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the schools; Mrs. N. E. J., for outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Shoal Creek, N. C.; Mrs. M. D. M., that a Spirit-filled preacher be sent to the town of Waco, Texas, and that the town may be greatly stirred spiritually, and the saloons closed; M. S. R., that souls may be saved as the result of revival meetings at Bayview, Va.; Mrs. W. E. W., for awakening in the churches of Fox Lake, Wis.; Mrs. E. A., for revival at St. Clair, Minn.; H. R., of Dallas, Wis., for a spirit of unity among the churches; Mrs. J. W. S., for nation-wide prohibition.

Mrs. F. M. B. asks prayers for the victory of the cause of State-wide prohibition in Virginia.

Mrs. S. R. B. asks prayer that two sons may be restored to their right mind; Mrs. O. B. C. and Mrs. C. D., that daughters may be restored to their right minds; E. L. B., a sister; H. A. B., Mrs. J. F., Mrs. M. S. S., and Mrs. I. B. S., friends.

Mrs. J. R. B. asks prayers that her sight may be restored; E. D., that mother's sight may be restored; W. W. and G. A. I., daughters'; J. W. and X. Y. Z., sisters'; N. M. and Mrs. E. M. G., other relatives'.

M. E. D. asks prayer to be delivered from the drink habit; E. A. B., Mrs. J. E. C., L. E. S., A. J. S., Mrs. W. K. C., A. C. N., Mrs. F. E. H., that sons may be delivered from the drink habit; Mrs. B. R., her husband; Mrs. I. McL., Mrs. A. P. O., M. C., X. Y. Z., Mrs. D. A. S., M. S. R., L. A. B., Mrs. P. B., L. A. B., that friends may be saved from the drink habit. Mrs. F. F. asks prayer that she may be delivered from a drug habit; W. W. W., that a son may be cured of the drug habit.

The following friends ask prayers for the assurance of sins forgiven, a deeper work of grace in the heart, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing:

Mrs. F. J. H.; Mrs. E. A. F.; Mrs. F.; Mrs. D. A. A. S.; "A Soul in Distress" (to have assurance that sins are forgiven, also to overcome temper); E. D.; M. A. S.; K. F.; Mrs. W. A. L.; Mrs. A. E. B.; Mrs. A. T.; Mrs. J. C. R.; H. R.; Miss M. F.; Miss M. H.; S. E. G.; J. L. P.; Mrs. E. R.; Mrs. C. M. B.; N. M.; M. E. D.; M. W.; Mrs. M. B. McI.; Mrs. J. E. C.; Mrs. J. M. K.; Mrs. E. A.; M. S. M.; Mrs. J. W. S.; Mrs. T.; Miss M. C.; Mrs. M. G.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of sons:

Mrs. A. R. O.; A. C. H.; Mrs. G. H.; M. L. H.; Mrs. A. G. C.; Mrs. F. E. H.; Mrs. W. H. G.; Mrs. E. D. G.; Mrs. N. E. J.; Mrs. M. D. M.; Mrs. M. J. D.; Mrs. L. M. N.; Mrs. E. R.; Mrs. C. M. B.; Mrs. J. E. C.; A. J. S.; Mrs. L. D. B.; Mrs. T. L. H.; Mrs. A. T. L.; Mrs. S. A. C.; Anxious Mother, Covington, Tenn.

The following friends ask prayer for the conversion of husbands:

Mrs. M. T. K.; Mrs. E. M. C.; Mrs. T. L. H.; Mrs. W. A. L.; Mrs. B. R.; Mrs. J. O. W.; Mrs. A. H.; Mrs. F. J. H.; E. G.; Mrs. A. H. C.; Mrs. T. C. McC.; Mrs. A. W.

Ingersoll

the Dollar Watch

School is on—work is on—you need a watch.

Chiefly you need one you can be sure of.

One that is a comfort for the time it keeps,—not a worry for the fear you may drop it.

You owe yourself an Ingersoll.

Now, while the Fall snap is in the air, and you've all the vigour and initiative of the opening of the work season,—Get it.

And remember that most of the satisfaction of a watch that's right is that you know it's right.

If the name Ingersoll is on its face, you know your watch tells the truth.

In every village, town and city the price is the same—the Ingersoll is the Dollar watch everywhere.

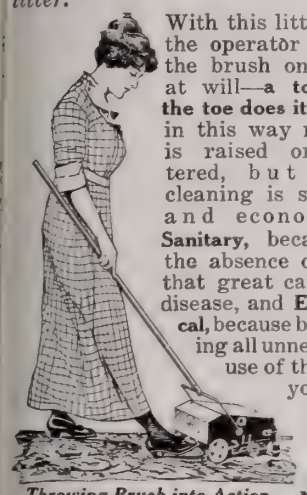
As originators of the Sweeper Type Vacuum Cleaner we have always aimed to make the Domestic the best that inventive genius and skilled labor can produce.

Our New Invention

That Foot Control of the Brush is an important feature, absolutely essential to a Combination Sweeper and found only on the Domestic.

A brush attachment should be used as little as possible—only after the vacuum nozzle has failed to pick up any lint, threads, or surface litter.



Throwing Brush into Action

With this little lever the operator throws the brush on or off at will—a touch of the toe does it. Used in this way no dust is raised or scattered, but your cleaning is sanitary and economical. Sanitary, because of the absence of dust, that great carrier of disease, and Economical, because by avoiding all unnecessary use of the brush you have doubled the life of your rugs. No other machine has this quick andeasy change.

Ease of Operating the Domestic makes it a cleaner for every home. The housewife who takes the entire care of her home wants this combination cleaner because she does her entire cleaning with one machine and one operation, and she uses but little of her time and strength. With the least amount of exertion the home is clean, bright, attractive, and best of all, it is sanitary.

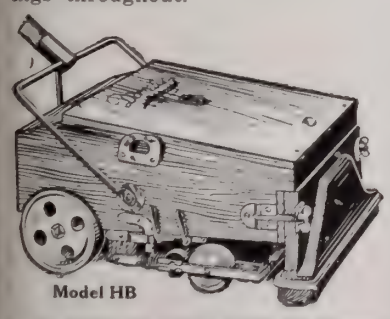
The frail woman can use it without overtaxing her strength, so easily does it run even when the brush attachment is in use—only slightly harder than the ordinary carpet sweeper. Ease of operation is obtained by the lightness of the cleaner with ball and roller bearings throughout.



Model HB

An Automatic Spring keeps the sweeper running freely, and takes care of any unevenness in the floor without the slightest attention of the user.

The Brush Adjustment makes it possible to adapt the sweeper to three thicknesses in the nap of carpets. The importance of this is appreciated by everyone who uses a combination cleaner, as it runs more easily, does far better work, and reduces the wear of the carpet to a minimum.

All the other features of the Domestic are described fully in our new booklet "What It Is and How It Does It." Send for a copy to-day.

This is a Dealer's Opportunity to supply the demand we are creating by offering a cleaner far superior to any ever placed on the market up to this time. Write for terms and discounts to dealers. Use the attached Post Card.

WHITER THAN SNOW

with mountain air, and your spiritual garments shall be shielded from defilement; you shall walk with him in white.

Out of that pure inbreathing, that consciousness of the Father's presence, there issued the positive, saving life of Jesus Christ. Christ sought no unhealthy seclusion. He did not seek to be unworldly by shutting himself out of the world. We are not alone; the Father is with us! Never tell your children that heaven is far away, or they may think God is. Tell them that heaven is very near, nearer even than sin! Tell them to live in that remembrance, and they will never be cowards, afraid to do right; they will be heroes, knights of purity, backed up by the army of the living God!

Our Lord will lead us on from glory to glory! The whiteness of innocence will begin to look gray before the whiteness of our holiness, until at last we shine forth in the Eternal Light! Do you know who are the conspicuous ones in the city of perfect day? That apostle who was permitted to see the wonders of the New Jerusalem had his attention riveted by "a multitude whom no man could number, clothed in white robes, and palms in their hands." And he wonderingly asked the angel, "Who are these?" These conspicuous ones "arrayed in white robes, and whence came they?" Well, who were they? Were they the angel host, clothed in innocence, white as snow, "the spirits that surround the throne" who have "never, never known a fallen world like this?" Nay, the conspicuous ones had robes whiter than innocence, whiter than snow! "These are they who came out of great tribulation," out of the thick, murky atmosphere and the unclean streets of the world, "and washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." They have traveled from innocence through tribulation, and they shine with the white radiance of the stars for ever and ever.

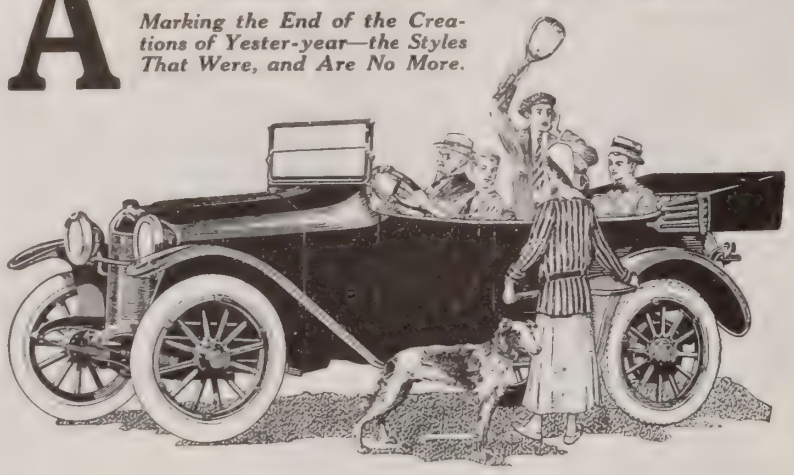
A SWEEPING VICTORY!

Marking the End of the Creations of Yester-year—the Styles That Were, and Are No More.



Gone for good are the knobs and angles and patchworks of ancient styles. In their place is a new vogue for America—a new and infinitely finer fashion—the European streamline. And the Detroiter ushers it in,—the first actual European streamline in America; first high speed, long stroke, ball bearing motor; lightest car of its class; biggest car for the money; with a chassis construction that has always made the Detroiter the criterion of mechanical genius.

The 1915 Detroiter

Here is the limit of beauty, durability, value. This is the leader. Thirty-five special features give the last extreme in refinement—and they all come in the list price—they are not "extras."

Just notice these new conveniences. The recording instruments combined in one unit, every control at your finger tips. Carburetor adjustment on the steering post; carburetor itself raised to an easily accessible point. An emergency light and cigar lighter. A red electric flash that warns against lack of oil.—And these are only half a dozen of the thirty-five.

The Detroiter, like the Gold Standard, is the basis for calculating your money's worth. Send today for our illustrated folder. See a Detroiter dealer. Put in your order quick.

beginning expenses. Poor Mother, though; she was so sure I'd settle down at home and teach. I suppose I could have had the high school place—"

Miss Huldah Cook, who was to resign from that position in a few months, had begun as a girl not much older than Ruth Annie. She and her mother had lived together cozily on her salary for many years. Had Mother been looking ahead to years like those? She and Ruth Annie living together cozily for many years?

Curiously, the mere money part—with its partial release, at any rate, to Mother from the sewing, sewing, sewing—did not occur to the girl now. It did not occur to Mother. On the other hand there was room only for a passionate earnestness and eagerness to devote her young, reverent services to those in need and darkness; on the other hand, Mother had only room to think of the great loneliness ahead. Neither daughter nor mother meant to be selfish—it was not the mother who was selfish; oh, not the mother!

Time, that never will stand still, seemed now to hasten—to run. The plan so unexpectedly made on that evening of the missionary lecture did not waver with daylight or weeks or dreads. Preparations went steadily forward for the course in nursing at the hospital. The neat little uniforms were made—the white aprons and collars and cuffs and the perky little caps. Mother, used to sewing, sewed on steadily; but there was a difference between these patient stitchings and those on Mrs. Supervisor Craven's clothes. These stitches that mother took now perforated her heart at every needle-stroke.

Esther Tilden was a humble seamstress, not a dressmaker. Gowns made by those higher up in the trade of sewing were brought to her merely for finishing, and even then only by those of her friends who, as they confessed to themselves, were willing to "risk considerable" for the sake of "helping out" poor Esther Tilden. The money earned came slowly, but it had always come. It had never occurred to Esther or Ruth Annie that it might stop coming.

Ruth Annie, speckless and sweet in her nurse's uniform, made beautiful progress at the big, grim House of Pain. She was a favorite with those in authority from the beginning, and those lying in the rows upon rows of little white beds loved Ruth Annie as she slipped past them or stooped over them. The letters she wrote home to mother were full of enthusiasm and earnest zeal. There was plenty of love, too, in those hurried letters home. Dear Mother! Oh, dear Mother, who had been willing to give her up!

Ruth Annie received one day early in her second year rather a disquieting letter from Mother. When she got time to read it at all, she read it more than once. Yet it was a cheerful and chatty little letter, full of news. The disquieting news did not masquerade under that guise in the least; it was just plain news, written quietly enough by Mother's needle-worn fingers.

"I went to bed right after supper last night; what do you think of that?" wrote the quiet fingers toward the letter's end. "I didn't have anything to do! Remember when you used to try to hire me with kisses to go to bed early and not sit up to sew? Five kisses if I'd go at ten, ten kisses at nine, 'fifty-'leven' if I'd go with you? Where are my 'fifty-'leven' kisses for last night? No, I'm not working too hard; you needn't worry. Louise Craven hasn't brought me a thing to do lately, nor much of anybody else, for that matter. I can sit in the Aunt Rhody chair and fold my hands! That sewing on Antoinette Dutton's wedding underclothes I finished a month ago; there were only sheets and pillow-slips, after all. I guess she decided to do the fine, lac work herself, and maybe it was abou as well, I'm getting so blind. Ha the time I spend sunny days rippin out what I sewed on dark days; yo needn't be a mite surprised if I tak to sending my needles to you for yo to thread! Oh, Ruthanny, you bette take your old Mother's advice an never grow old!"

Emileen Addis roomed with Rut Annie in this tiny, spotless cubby hole of space. She came in as th disturbing letter was finished for th third time. Ruth Annie's face caugh her keen eye at once.

"What's the matter? Miss Traver been scolding you? Tell your ol auntie," she cooed. Emileen wa small and outrageously childish look ing. But the funny little "old auntie failed to elicit any smile this time.

"I'm worried about Mother," Rut Annie said slowly. "She talks abou sitting still and folding her hands—"

"My gracious, Ruth Annie Tilden don't you want her to sit still? don't see what on earth there is i that to worry about!"

"You would if you knew Mother," sighed Ruth Annie. "I'm certai something's wrong." But in the hurry and interest of her hours on duty which were long hours, she put aside her disturbing thoughts until bed time; and, at bedtime, being healthily exhausted, she fell asleep. So the busy, overfull days multiplied into busy, overfull weeks. A month elapsed.

"Miss Tilden, I wish to speak with you a moment," the Head Nurse saic crisply one morning. "At the end of the ward, please, as soon as you have finished with that bed."

Hannah Travers was spectacled and stout and Hannah-y; as Emileen Addis said, her mother must have known she was going to be head nurse when she named her. She was awaiting Ruth Annie, standing—an irritating way with her of expressing hurry.

"You are to take charge of the new patient in Room L at once, please—your entire attention until I relieve you. It is a case of collapse. On the train going through they put her off here; brought her in half an hour ago. Doctor Goldie calls it pure collapse—from overwork and underfeeding, probably. Rather a pitiful case. Go at once, please—Room L. I will make out your diet and treatment and send it to you later. You will give the patient a warm bath and alcohol rub."

To the attentive young nurse, listening carefully, one sentence of Hannah Travers's stood out in astonishing bold relief: "Rather a pitiful case." Miss Travers to call a case—any case—pitiful! Ruth Annie made note of it. Mem.: Tell Emileen Addis that.

She went at once to Room L, moving with the silent ease acquired by practice. The poor, collapsed patient lay huddled on the bed, apparently as they had left her there. Her face was turned away from the door. The head nurse's astonishing lapse into sympathy lingered in Ruth Annie's mind and, perhaps, in some degree influenced her own first impression—or was it some curious, unexplainable stir within her own heart? Something in that spent, stirless little huddle of woman on the narrow bed, there, caught her by the throat. There was something familiar.

Ruth Annie sprang noiselessly forward to the side of the bed and peered down.

"Mother!"

It was Mother there on the bed—Mother collapsed and huddled—Mother!

The heavy-lidded, faded eyes opened a very little way and instantly closed again as if the effort were too much work. There was no sign of recognition—Mother was only conscious of the strange, sweet rest that

FLORENCE

—the Oil Stove Line that Assures Pleased Customers

Merchants who sell Florence Oil Cook Stoves, Oil Heaters and Florence Ovens find that their sales "stick." They find that their customers are pleased with oil cook stoves that can be depended on for years, that give the right cooking heat at the right time—with oil economy. They find that their customers are delighted with Florence Glass Door Ovens and with the Florence Oil Heaters that really heat up a whole room, not merely their own near vicinity. Consider these facts—and sell this line.

Let us tell you the whole story about the wonderful Florence Oil Stove line. Write for catalog.

FLORENCE OVENS with Glass Doors

The arched or curved top lining in the Florence Oven has been highly complimented by professional bakers. It follows the designs of the big bakers' ovens. Keeps the hot air circulating to the center of the oven instead of deflecting to the edges of the cooking. You see your baking at any time without opening the oven. The oven grates run from front to back, instead of lengthwise. Liquid pies or puddings slide in easily. No slopping—no spilling. Ovens are full asbestos lined.

CIRCUMSTANCES

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"THE following," ran a subscriber's letter, "is a heroic deed by a little girl ten years old named Hazel Hard, who, with several other children, lives with her parents in Perkins County, South Dakota.

"As little Hazel is the oldest of the children she is often left at home in charge of the little ones, while the mother and father are away. It was on one of these occasions that the roof of the house caught fire from a defective stovepipe.

"As soon as the child discovered the flames, she took her little brothers and sisters out of the house for safety, and then, climbing up on the roof of a shed, threw water at the house until the blaze died down and finally was subdued."

In one of Anthony Hope's thrillingly improbable romances the hero (an Englishman) and the heroine (a Greek princess) are talking. The princess asked the man how he could love her in such a short time (or some other just as important question).

"Why," said the hero, rising gracefully to the occasion, "circumstances alter cases." And so they do.

I have no doubt that the little heroine girl of the Middle West was afraid of the dark, and ghost stories, and mice. And yet, with utter disregard of self, she was brave enough, single-handed, to put out a fire that threatened a family of small children, and incidentally, a home.

I knew of a girl who was always very brave. She was hardly ever afraid of anything that her friends feared; she could swim against the strongest current, climb the steepest hills and fight the wildest storms, with assurance. She walked through cemeteries at twelve o'clock on Hallowe'en, and was never afraid to give her opinion, even if the speaking was sure to hurt her. Everybody called her a "perfect wonder," and the youngest boys and girls who knew her in school were her little slaves.

"Why," a humble hero-worshiper said once, "she'll do anything at all. She wouldn't take a dare—not she!"

One day the girl and her small sister went to the seashore, and while the tiny child played in the shallow water, she sat on the sand with her usual admiring throng around her, and described a new crawl stroke that she had learned.

"You can swim faster that way," she was saying, when a shrill scream came to them, and quite far out they saw the tiny sister's head bobbing frantically up and down.

It was the girl's chance to do something worth while. Here was an emergency to test the swiftness of the new stroke! But the girl who was brave, who was afraid of nothing, who would never take a dare, sank down in a huddled little bunch and put her face in her hands.

"I can't go out," she moaned. "I couldn't swim a stroke! Save her—" And without moving she sat on the beach with white face and staring eyes while another swimmer, not nearly as accomplished as she, brought in the little girl, just barely alive.

I knew another girl, a mouse-quiet little thing with a timid air that made people want to pet and comfort and shield her. She was nervous about caterpillars, and a cut finger made her hold her breath and lose the pinkness from her cheeks. Men affectionately called her a "little 'fraid cat," and women laughed at her lack of nerve.

One day the girl and her mother were alone in the house, when without warning the sky blackened and a huge clap of thunder sounded. A ball of fire, or so it seemed to the terrified eyes of the girl, swept across the floor and burst at her mother's feet.

In five minutes the scene had changed from the peace of a summer day to a death-like night-time, and the "little 'fraid cat" saw her mother lying, bleeding and unconscious, at her feet. But, although the was the type of girl who shrieks at a mouse, she had the fainting woman propped up comfortably, her wounds roughly bandaged, and was speeding through the terrible darkness and thunder for the doctor, in less than ten minutes. She had saved her mother's life.

"Circumstances alter cases." It's that way in work and in play, in life and death, friends of mine. A football game, or a battle, or a surgical operation, or a kingdom is often lost because a would-be hero shows a "yellow streak" when he should show courage; while oftentimes an insignificant person, who has passed unnoticed for years, comes into the limelight by saving life, and mending hearts, and winning souls with a bravery that no one who knew him had ever suspected.

Girls, dear, our natures we can't help at all, we are born with them. But I think that we can build our characters, don't you? So when you criticize somebody, try to think of what they might do in an emergency; and when you feel like backing down in your everyday tasks, or in the really big, soul-stirring problems of life, think of the little girl who saved her home and the 'fraid cat who kept her mother alive. For, friends of mine, we must mold our heads and our hearts and our hands to meet the circumstances that stand before us day by day, and meet them with courage.

TWO INTERESTING EXPERIENCES

—KITTIE WOOD KUMARAKULASINGHI, a missionary worker, writes from Newara Eliya, Ceylon, of an adventure that befel her lately during a forest excursion. Her letter says: "I went to the forest one day to see that proper timber was cut, accompanied by about a dozen natives. The path was as nearly perpendicular as possible—the forest is dense, on the top of the highest mountains in Ceylon—and many, many miles in extent. Being very tired and wet, as we had rain, I sat down. The men went a short distance saying that they would return, but instead of doing so, thy went down the mountain. When I realized I was alone, I started to find the way out. I could see down the mountain, and tried to get out there. What a terrible thing it is to be lost! The farther I went the more difficulties I got into. Two or three times I fell into holes covered by deep grass, but persevered as I could still see down the mountain. At last, I got into a cornbrake, where the reeds were far above my head, and the ground was not very firm. I could scarcely force my way through it. I took another step, and there was no bottom! Catching hold of the projecting roots of a tree as I fell, I drew my self up again, and discovered that I was on the edge of a deep ravine, which entirely cut off any further progress in that direction. Do not think that I was not scared—I was. The jungle is infested with leopards, wild boar and deer, and sometimes wild elephants. It was getting late; there was no way save to retrace my steps. I stumbled into two or three open places, which deer frequented. I prayed God, and said to my beating heart 'Be still!' and then stopped to think. Then I found a path of deer and then of men, and before dark I got out. The men were thoroughly scared, and four of them had gone to look for me, but I arrived before they did."

"I HAVE NOT BEEN as well as I ought to be for some time, and have not tried to do much," writes an American woman missionary in Persia to the secretary of the Northfield Seminary Alumnæ Association, in response to a request for an account of her work. "The only thing that has counted for much this winter, outside of home, has been reading to an aged couple (Syrians) from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Both are nearly blind, and they do so enjoy being read to. They like especially to hear the sermon and Daily Meditation in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. As to the work that is going on in our station, there is a good attendance of Persians, Syrians, and Armenians in our two schools. Some of the older boys in the Syrian department go out to villages and hold meetings on Sunday, or talk with Syrians, Persians or Kurds. There is great willingness to hear the word among the Moslems (Persians) in the villages. It is a time to push work for Moslems in all the world."

A church that tripled its membership in eight years

—that became the livest thing in the town.

People throng to it and like it because it does things. The story of it all will wake up every "dead church."

SANITAS
MODERN WALL COVERING

For Every Room In Your House

PUT SANITAS on the walls of every room—and then forget all about them. Know the joy of having a wall covering that is clean and sanitary—that is harmonious and artistic.

When SANITAS gets soiled—when it is dusty or spotted with finger prints—just wipe it off with a damp cloth and all its original freshness and beauty immediately will reappear.

SANITAS is a cloth wall covering, richly finished in oil colors. It cannot fade, crack or chip off—practically indestructible. SANITAS on your walls means money saved—because you do not have to redecorate every year or two.

A dining-room that speaks of hospitality, a cheery reception hall, comfortable living-room, bright, clean kitchen—let the walls of every room express your own good taste. Cover them with SANITAS. There are over 130 exquisite designs. Ask your decorator or dealer to show you SANITAS—see the trade mark on the back of the goods—or write us your needs and we will send you samples of the newest and most beautiful SANITAS designs for this fall.

We maintain a permanent demonstration of SANITAS in the Craftsman Exposition, 6 East 39th St., New York City sent to the bottom by a German submarine. This is worthy of more than passing notice, since it is the first authenticated case of a submarine accomplishing such a result.

England is talking about closing the North Sea to commerce. It would be a very interesting question of international law to know on what she founds her legal right so to do. It will be remembered that at the time the United States desired to make Behring Sea a "mare clausam," to protect the young seal against the Canadian poachers, England denied our right so to do, and the portion of that sea we desired to close was solely contiguous to our land territory. By no stretch, even of a friendly imagination, is the North Sea solely contiguous to England's land territory.

As a result of the five-day battle which concluded on Saturday the twelfth of September, we find the German forces reformed in a line beginning at some point on a line with and a little east of Amiens, thence running in a general sense east through Soissons, Fismes, Rheims, Chalons, Vaubecourt and Pagny. From this last point it changes direction slightly and runs a little northeast skirting Nancy to Lunéville, thence southeast by Baccarat to St. Dié. The result of this battle up to the present time may be fairly called indecisive. Probably the Germans will not resume the offensive for a few days, both armies standing in need of rest and refreshment. In addition to which, a German reinforcement is known to be approaching from Belgium, which is said to be about 60,000 strong, whose arrival will strengthen the rather battered right wing.

The various rumors of peace which are being given so much publicity are, I think, very premature.

Good Economy

ONCE in eight years all the locks on United States mail bags must be changed, if not oftener. This is because after a while a good many lost keys get around, and they are not very safe to have so distributed.

Just now the Equipment Division of the Post Office Department is making over 500,000, merely for the purpose of making them different. They were very good in their day, and are still so in other respects. At first it was suggested that all these 500,000 locks should be thrown away. The junkmen were asked how much they would give for them, and they said twenty cents a hundred pounds. This did not seem large, inasmuch as the Post Office Department had originally paid about seventy-five cents apiece for the locks. Therefore, it was concluded to make them over again, and this is being done now at a repair shop in Washington at a cost of seven cents per lock.

It is a very pretty sight to see the workmen cut the old contrivances apart, polish them up on rapidly revolving grindstones which give out showers of sparks, and put together the pieces into as good shape as the new lamps which the magician in the story of Aladdin exchanged for old ones.

"Yes, Sir!
—it's the base that counts"

A Stucco constructed house is only as lasting as its walls. And its walls are only as durable as the base upon which the Stucco is laid. "Build of Stucco" is sound advice. But specify that the plaster be laid over

Kno-Burn
Expanded Metal Lath

Then you will have positive assurance that both the outside and inside walls of your home will be smooth and permanent. "KNO-BURN" Metal Lath belongs to all plaster walls, either for exteriors or interiors. It is built on the mesh principle. The plaster settles over and around it into knobs—each knob larger than the opening through which it came—and grips with a tenacity that never loosens. KNO-BURN Metal Lath costs no more than bases that are perishable. It reduces fire risk and is proof against decay. Ask your architect.

THE PATIENT IN ROOM L

she had fallen upon. She did not even wonder.

Ruth Annie never remembered accurately what things she did next nor the order of her doing them. Strict obedience to routine propelled her automatically through the duties assigned to her. She was a nurse and this was her patient. She worked with skilled, gentle hands that did not dare to be tender—she must not think of this poor, lax body as Mother! She must stop thinking and only do. By and by—

By and by, in her tiny cubbyhole of space, she let herself think, and thoughts overswept her in a tumultuous cataract. Emileen Addis raised a small, sharp face from her pillow and listened, for Ruth Annie thought aloud in gasps of speech.

"She was on her way to Ryerson Beach to—to cook! She hasn't had any sewing to do for, oh, months! They thought her stitches weren't even enough and short enough—they gave her up! She was going to cook in a hotel kitchen to earn money to live—oh, I know! I know! She muttered it all to herself while I bathed her and rubbed her. Mother—bathed and rubbed Mother! She was my patient in Room L. She collapsed on the train because she was so tired out. They put her off and brought her here—to me! My patient—Mother! I went there and found her in Room L. Emileen Addis, have I been as blind as that? I wanted to go and nurse the heathen in a foreign land and it was my own Mother needed my nursing! All this time I let her get tireder and tireder—and all this time her heart was breaking at having me go—oh, I know! She muttered that, too."

Suddenly Ruth Annie swept about and threw out her arms. "I thought it was grand and beautiful to go to those poor black people!"

"It is, dear—it is grand and beautiful," soothed Emileen.

"For you—yes," flashed Ruth, "you and the rest. There's no one needs you—your mother is dead. You h a right to go; but I had Mother! little, little tired-out Mother— Emileen, she collapsed!" Ru Annie's cry ended in sobs.

Six weeks later she helped Moth dress, for Mother was going back her empty little home. She was rested but still a shaken and fr Mother. Ruth Annie's hands dar tenderness.

"There, you look sweet! We'll sta in a minute, now—yes, of course, I going to drive to the station wi you! Of course Miss Travers will l me. She's a dear, Mother; who wou have thought it?"

At the station Mother was careful installed in her train. Then Ru Annie calmly sat down beside her.

"Oh—oh, you better get off no Ruthanny! I'm afraid the train w start—kiss me, dearie, quick, and g off. I'm all right, every bit, I'm ju as comfortable as I can be. You' thought of everything, dear."

"Well, it was about time, I think

"There, we're moving! I feel u Oh, Ruthanny!"

"Oh, Mother!" laughed Ruth Anni "don't you see I'm going too? hon with you? I'm going to take a pr vate case. The dearest patient, nan o' Mother! And when my patie doesn't need a nurse any more I' going to tackle Miss Huldah Cook patience in the high school! That's pun, Mother; laugh!"

"Ruthanny!" but Mother was n laughing.

"Yes, dear, don't say a word. can't let my patient get excited! It all settled, nice as a pin; Supervis Craven wrote me I could have t place. It's my place! We're goi to have a beautiful time, you and and Emileen Addis is going to Afri to nurse my poor black folks for m Mother! Mother! you're going 'grow old along with me'!"

Ruth Annie, regardless of looker on, kissed Mother's bewildered b happy face.

"Dear," Ruth Annie cried softl "the 'best is yet to be'!"

tion throughout the country is as large as that on a battleship, which varies from sixty to three hundred and fifty, according to conditions. A more sincere, earnest and enthusiastic crowd of men would be hard to find. They represent all ages, from the ordinary seaman of seventeen to the chief mate of fifty-six. All feel the need of communion with God, and we should all rejoice that so many more will now have the opportunity of attending service, who have for so long been denied that privilege.

At 10.15 A.M. "church call" is sounded through the ship, the church flag is hoisted over the national ensign, and the men gather to the strains of the band or orchestra in the large gun compartment on the main deck, where church has been rigged. After this a hymn is sung, followed by responsive readings, hymns, prayer, Scripture reading, special music (at times), a talk of about twenty minutes, followed by a hymn and closing prayer in which all join; the service is then closed with the benediction. T ship's orchestra accompanies t hymns and the enthusiastic singi would be an inspiration to the avera church. The unity and regulari with which the men join in the r sponsive readings is remarkable. I tense interest is shown throughout t service. Better listeners could not found than the enlisted men of t navy.

After the service, the chaplain oft experiences the happiest moments the week, in talks with men. Many man will be remembered by the cha lain whose name may slip from me ory, because of his heart-to-heart ta at this time of soul-awakening.

This is not written to describe t duties of the naval chaplain, but to i form the many interested ones, esp cially those having sons in the nav that real religious services are co ducted on our ships at sea, and that a very short time there will doubtle be very few ships without such adva tages.

The New SAXON—$395

Best Two-Passenger Automobile in the World at Anywhere Near Its Price

We claim that the Saxon car today is the best two-passenger automobile in the whole world at anywhere near its price, for the following reasons: Because—

The Saxon has more room than any other; it is more comfortable to ride in; it is better looking; it has better materials in it; it is lighter; it is more up-to-date in design; it has more style, is more distinctive; it has plenty of power for all emergencies and all road conditions; it can be kept running for less cost per mile than any other car.

People Have Wanted This Type of Car

The Saxon is an advanced example of the pe of car toward which public demand is ding. It is the real embodiment in an tomobile of Efficiency and Economy— two great watchwords of the present y in all lines of life and business.

Because you and other men and women e you want good cars of low first cost d economical upkeep the Saxon has nd a ready market. Selling at $395, hipped and ready to run, with its iciency and economy already proved over 6500 owners, the Saxon is the car t a hundred thousand people have been hing for.

Good and Good-Looking

When you look at the Saxon, however, u do not think first of low price, for the xon car does not look like a cheap car. ere is about it something distinctive, ferent, yet not freakish. It has style, ividuality. People tell us it is better king than any other low priced two-ssenger automobile.

In body lines it follows the most up-to-te French practice. It has the same pe of body that cars costing $1500 to 00 possess. Its tapered bonnet, char-eristic radiator, molded oval fenders, e wheels (without extra charge), grace-running boards give it a snap and char-er never before approached in any low ced car. The painting and finish of assis and body are as good as on many a costing five times as much.

A Roomy, Comfortable Car

When you sit in the Saxon you are pressed with its exceptional roominess. nty of width for two big people to sit nfortably. Plenty of length for the tallest man to stretch his legs. The Saxon has good cushions to sit on and a comfortable back to lean against. Its cantilever springs, so popular abroad, will surprise you by their easy-riding qualities.

On starting the car you will be pleased to notice how quiet it is, how free from vibration, how smoothly it runs along—fast or slow at will. It will throttle down better than other low priced cars. It has more power in proportion to its size; and will develop more speed with less effort.

Further, the Saxon motor keeps cool under all conditions.

Easiest Car to Handle

The Saxon is easy to steer. It is nimble-footed. Quick to run in and out of traffic. It turns short. It takes up little room. It is far easier to drive than any larger car.

With gasoline filler cap extending up through the cowl; with switch key, carburetor adjustment and throttle in the cowl board, with left drive, two pedals and center control the Saxon is the most convenient of the low priced cars and the easiest to handle.

You Know You Can Afford It

The wonderful economy of the Saxon has been the greatest source of satisfaction to the thousands who have already bought these cars. Saxons everywhere are averaging from 28 to 32 miles per gallon of gasoline; 75 to 100 miles on a pint of oil; 3500 to 5000 miles and more per set of tires. And when replacements are necessary a complete new tire costs the owner only $12 or less.

The Saxon is a car that seldom sees the repair shop, but when a repair or replacement is necessary, the parts required are low-priced and the work is easily and quickly done—because of the simple and accessible construction of the car.

Quality Inbuilt in Saxon

The success of the Saxon car at $395, the great public interest in it, the enthusiasm of Saxon dealers and Saxon owners has done more than any other one thing to make a number of companies in the low-priced field reduce their prices.

But the price of the Saxon car, already lower than that of any other two-passenger car of standard specifications, does not need to be cut in order for it to continue to sell in large quantities. We put full value into the Saxon car in the beginning.

Many said we could not build such a car to sell for $395. Yet we have built 6500 of them and are building more all the time.

The reason we can do this is that the Saxon car is a good car. The foundation of the success of every company lies in the goodness of the product that company has to sell. And the Saxon is good. It is right.

Public Shares the Profits

We offered in the beginning a car of superior merit for $395. We shared our profits with the public from the start, because we never could have built the Saxon car to sell for $395 unless we had been willing to accept a very small profit per car.

We are still accepting a small profit, because we are here to continue doing business on a larger and larger scale, and that is possible only when buyers are getting big value for their money.

We give every buyer of a Saxon car more than he can get in any other car in the world at anywhere near the price.

Test the Saxon Yourself

A personal trial—backed by the experience of 6500 Saxon owners—will convince you of the merit of this car, will prove that it is the car for you. Our dealer is eager to show you the Saxon. Arrange today for a demonstration.

ITALY BREAKING AWAY FROM ROME

By REV. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice

IN THE reclamation of waste lands a process of clearance precedes a process of planting. Before the wilderness and the solitary place can be made glad and the desert rejoice and blossom as the rose, there must be a digging up and a cutting down, and a casting out of noxious plants and trees. The pick and the spade must be at work, the saw and the ax must be used, and probably also the more powerful gunpowder and dynamite must be brought into service for blasting. Then when the ground is thus cleared and prepared, it can be sown with good seed and planted with fruit-bearing trees. And as it is in the natural world, so it is in the moral and spiritual. There must be a casting down, a destruction of imaginations, and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, before every thought can be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ.

Italy has for the most part done the first work. Her people have cleared their minds of the errors, superstitions and idolatries of the Roman Catholic Church. They have ceased to believe in the power of a sacrificing priest, or in any necessity for one. They have ceased to believe in auricular confession, or in priestly absolution. They have ceased to believe in Mariolatry, in saint-worship, in the efficacy of saintly relics, in the infallibility of the Pope—in a word, in the divine character of the Roman Church, even in its being a Christian church at all. Their views on this are very strong.

I once heard the late eminent Professor Signor Mariano Rafaele say at a public meeting in Florence: "I was born in the Catholic Church, I was brought up in the Catholic Church, I loved the Catholic Church, and my confessor always assured me that if I remained inside its pale and had its services said for me, my salvation was secure, independent altogether of my character and life. But I have been reading my New Testament, and I find nothing of the kind. I find there that my salvation depends on a change of heart wrought in me by the Holy Spirit, through faith in Christ's atoning work. Therefore, the Roman Catholic Church is not only not a Christian church, it is the very antithesis of Christianity." Indeed, in Italy it is not a creditable thing to be a church-frequenting Roman Catholic. Public opinion is against such men. Italy, therefore, as a whole, has completed the work of clearance, of rooting up and casting out all those papal evils which dwarf intellect and weaken the will, blunt the moral sense, and corrupt the heart.

And now Italy is busy sowing good seed in the mind, planting trees of righteousness, purifying the heart, elevating the moral sense, and leading the affections to God, realizing that religion is not a thing of outward rites and ceremonies, or of church connection, but a thing of the heart, of a man's personal attitude toward God. And so, in a word, Italy is fast putting on a Biblical Christianity. Of this I desire to set before the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD three illustrations, or proofs:

1. Bible Circulation

The Bible is running quickly through the land, having free course, and being glorified. The sales of the publications of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of the Scottish National Society, and of the American Bible Society are extremely gratifying and hopeful. Their Bibles and their colporteurs go everywhere. Wherever a market is held, wherever a holiday is being observed, the colporteur appears, and does a good business. There are two classes of men who never fail to buy books—priests and druggists! But I am not laying so much stress on the sale of these foreign-produced Bibles as on the fact that the Italians are printing and publishing the Bible for themselves, and they find that the demand for a native Bible is such that it pays them to print and sell it. There is no charity in the matter, no propaganda. The Bible is printed, published and sold on a business footing like any other book, and it pays to do so. Some years ago Signor Sonzogreo, the newspaper proprietor in Milan, began to publish in parts a large, illustrated family Bible. Wherever he put his newspapers, on the bookstalls of railway stations, at kiosks at street corners, in bakers', in tobacconists', as well as in booksellers' shops, he put the parts of his Bible. His newspapers cost one cent, the parts of the Bible cost one cent each. He told me he sold one hundred thousand dollars' worth! A second edition met with a similar success. Now a third edition, printed on better paper, and having far more illustrations, is coming out at three cents a part, and is having a very large sale. I think nothing can be more gratifying, more hopeful for Italy. Having rejected Papal Christianity as veneered paganism (as a canon of St. Peter's said to me it was) or as the antithesis of Christianity, as Professor Mariano said it was, Italy is now putting on a Biblical Christianity.

2. Scripture Illustrated Post Cards

Italy is famous for artistic illustrated postcards. In every town and city one finds beautifully drawn and colored cards of the place. Here in Venice there are hundreds of them to be got—many of them real works of art. Every one buys and uses postcards. The idea, born of the love of Italians for the Bible, occurred to some one to print or procure Scripture postcards. The famous artist, Robert Leinweber, had prepared a series illustrative of the main facts of the Old Testament, and of the main incidents in the life of our Lord in the New Testament. These designs have been adopted, and now what do we find in circulation in Italy? We find one hundred and twenty different postcards illustrative of the Bible. Sixty of these deal with the Old Testament, and sixty with the New Testament. The Old Testament ones cover the story of the Fall, of the Patriarchs, of Joseph, of Moses, of Joshua, of Samson, of Samuel, and of Daniel. The New Testament ones take up the Annunciation, the Birth of our Lord, his Baptism, Temptation, Miracles, and Discourses, the Triumphal Entry, Last Supper, Agony in the Garden, Betrayal, Trial, Crucifixion, Burial, Resurrection, Appearances and Ascension. Also the Descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, the Martyrdom of Stephen, the Conversion of Paul, and Paul's trial, and arrival in Rome. As will be seen, the subjects chosen are very comprehensive, and very illustrative of the whole Bible. The arrangement of the postcard is the following: On its correspondence side on the left-hand corner, opposite the one where the stamp is placed, there is printed a passage of Scripture, or the summary of a passage with the textual reference. On the other side of the card is a beautifully colored picture in illustration of the passage. The cards almost presume that the receivers and senders of them have Bibles, and that if they are not familiar with the subjects illustrated they can look up the texts and read about them. As these postcards are designed for ordinary correspondence they show that Italy has not only rejected error, but it is learning the truth—that Italy is putting on a Biblical Christianity.

3. Laymen Preaching the Gospel

Throughout Italy there are many gatherings in towns and cities of men and women for the reading and study of the Bible, and for the preaching of the Gospel. But in Rome a remarkable

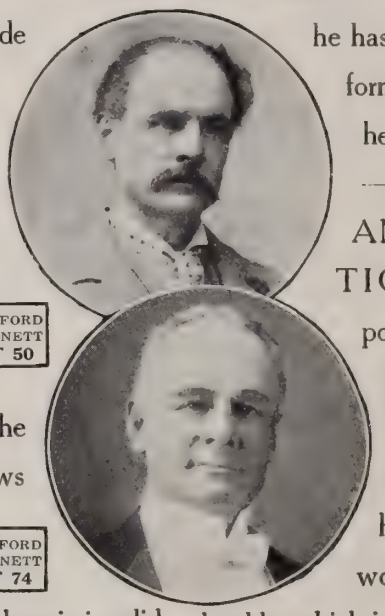
Old at Fifty!—
Young at Seventy

By HORACE FLETCHER

Author of "The A,B,-Z, of Our Own Nutrition," "The New Glutton or Epicure," "Menticulture," "Happiness," "That Last Waif," "Optimism," Etc.

OUT of the Golden West, and from a plain business man of the people, comes the reassuring message that broken-down, despondent, weak and almost down-and-out humanity may be reclaimed, recover, grow strong and become healthful and young again, simply by following a few simple rules that soon become so agreeable that it is easier than not to observe them and "get the habit."

Right conduct, made easy, is what most folks like, and that is what Sanford Bennett's rejuvenating system teaches. Mr. Bennett's photographs are most convincing. The first photograph shows him at fifty years of age, at which time he was practically a chronic invalid. The second photograph was taken after he had passed his seventieth milestone, and shows him to be as handsome an athlete as one could possibly imagine. At fifty his hair was fast deserting a half-dead skin: at seventy there is a fine covering of it, white as snow, but very much alive. His sight too has improved so much that it is no longer necessary for him to wear glasses which he could not do without at fifty.



Of course he recommends careful eating, thorough mastication, fresh air, optimistic thinking and other things necessary to health, but he helps his pupils in th details of care naturally, by star them right the first thing in morning.

Sanford Bennett is certainly great benefactor to the hur race—old and young alike. W his message is primarily for ol persons, it is attractive to yc as well.

It is a very easy matter for ev reader of this magazine to ob Mr. Bennett's complete system he has published it in form of a book wh he calls "OLD A —ITS CAU AND PREVE TION." For the p pose of spreadi broadcast this m sage of health prolonged you he has prepared wonderfully interest booklet which is in effect a summ of his system. This booklet he of free to any one who writes to Physical Culture Publishing Co pany, 3910 Flatiron Bldg., N. City, for it.

For having solved the problem perpetual youth during life, the wo owes Sanford Bennett a vote thanks. Of course there are those w will scoff at the idea, but the re wise men and women among th who hear of Sanford Bennett and h he renewed his youth and resto his health will most certainly inv tigate further, and at least acquir knowledge of his methods. —Advertise

Teeth Insurance

Sozodont comes in three forms,—Paste, Powder and Liquid. The kind used is generally a matter of individual taste.

We have found by experience—and we have made Sozodont since 1848—that the use of Liquid at night and either Paste or Powder in the morning, is the best form of teeth insurance.

This is very easily explained:

Sozodont Paste or Powder will put as beautiful a polish on the teeth as any paste or powder. One or the other should be used each morning. But no matter what paste or powder you use, it does not get between the teeth, and cleanse them as Sozodont Liquid will.

So just before retiring, we recommend that you use Sozodont Liquid. The Liquid gets in between the teeth and around the gums, stimulating and hardening them, where the Paste or Powder—even the tooth brush—cannot reach.

Sozodont Liquid is an alkaline and neutralizes the acidity of the mouth.

Simple enough, is it not? It doesn't cost any more either, because the Combination lasts just twice as long. Try Sozodont Combination. Ask your Druggist's or Dentist's opinion.

SICK DOCTOR

Proper Food Put Him Right

The food experience of a physician in his own case when worn and weak from sickness and when needing nourishment the worst way, is valuable:

"An attack of grip, so severe it came near making an end of me, left my stomach in such condition I could not retain any ordinary food. I knew of course that I must have food nourishment or I could never recover.

"I began to take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day and for 2 weeks this was almost my only food. It tasted so delicious that I enjoyed it immensely and my stomach handled it perfectly from the first mouthful. It was so nourishing it was quickly built back to normal health and strength.

"Grape-Nuts is of great value as food to sustain life during serious attacks in which the stomach is so deranged it cannot digest and assimilate other foods.

"I am convinced that were Grape-Nuts more widely used by physicians, it would save many lives that are otherwise lost from lack of nourishment." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The most perfect food in the world. Trial of Grape-Nuts and cream 10 days proves. "There's a Reason."

thing has happened. The old Roman Forum is used for public meetings on Sundays. Archeologists lecture on the monuments in the Forum, and literary men on Roman history. The other Sunday, the head of one of the oldest ducal families in Rome — Duke Falconieri — appeared with his New Testament. He began to read the Sermon on the Mount, and to comment on it. In the course of his remarks, he contrasted the mechanical prayers of the church, with their vain repetitions, with the example of prayer and the manner of praying enjoined by Christ. He went on to read Christ's miracles, and contrasted them with the false miracles attributed to Roman Catholic saints. Then he preached salvation through faith in Christ, in Christ's atoning sacrifice, and repudiated the mass and all the priest's sacrificial claims. The next Sunday he again appeared and again explained the Scriptures and preached Christ. Now, a hall has been found for him in which large audiences of all classes, from the highest to the lowest in Rome, assemble Sunday after Sunday to hear this Duke Falconieri expound the Holy Scriptures, and preach Christ as one only but all-sufficient Saviour.

Thus Italy is putting on a Biblical Christianity, and because of this, she is advancing rapidly in everything that marks the progress of a nation in life and usefulness and happiness. Once called by her own sons "a land of the dead," she is now a land of the living; once called by her own sons "a garden of Eden, without the tree of knowledge, and without the tree of life," these trees now flourish in her midst, and she is fast becoming a well-watered garden, which the Lord hath blessed.

Let England and America beware lest, whilst Italy is putting off Romanism and putting on Christianity and advancing in fulness of life, they may be putting off Christianity and putting on Romanism to their discomfiture and death. As John Ruskin has said: "We can never have the remotest fellowship with the utterers of that fearful falsehood and live."

Among the Workers

—A REMARKABLY HELPFUL BOOK of devotions has recently been issued by the Concordia Publishing House at St. Louis, Mo. It consists of a translation of the German edition of a book of short devotions, written by Pastor C. M. Zorn. The present edition is an English rendering by the author's son, Pastor H. M. Zorn. It is entitled Crumbs: Short Devotions For Every Day of the Year. The pages are full of a deeply spiritual devotion. There is an atmosphere of affectionate trust in the world's Saviour, a determination to keep the soul true to the great fact that spiritual life and strength come from the atonement made by the Christ on his cross, and the desire to apply the truths of the spiritual life to the needs of daily living. The book is handsomely bound; price, $1, postpaid.

—TO CELEBRATE THE completion of Rev. James A. Williamson's fifty years' pastorate of the United Presbyterian Church, Johnstown, N. Y., the church membership and a host of townspeople engaged in an evening reception, followed by a whole day and evening of special services, and a banquet the next evening, in June. Many brother ministers participated. A beautiful loving cup was among the gifts of the occasion. Dr. Williamson later preached his farewell sermon, having resigned as pastor.

—GOLDEN INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE, North Carolina, is located in the mountain region, part of the Appalachian range. Among the 3,000,000 population of the whole region, there are thousands without schools of any grade. Golden Institute offers to receive them and exerts a strong Christian educational influence. It includes a farm, where scientific agriculture, horticulture, animal husbandry, manual training and domestic science are taught. There is also a thorough Bible course for prospective Christian workers, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc. The institute is making an effort to secure funds for erecting a dormitory and to establish an orphanage. The school is co-educational and interdenominational. Any reader interested in this work, desiring to aid it may address Rev. [illegible] Scott, Glen Rock Station, Asheville, N. C.

Can Your Peaches This Year in the Better, Easier Way

PARE peaches and put into jars. For each pint jar take half a cup of water and a cup of sugar. Make a syrup of the sugar and water, and fill the jars full. Fasten the covers loosely and set in a "Wear-Ever" Roaster — filling the lower half with water. Cover and let come to a boil. Steam about ten minutes.

Take out the jars one at a time and fill each to the top with the boiling syrup and seal. You will have peaches, perfect in shape and color — and with less work and fuel, if you use the

"Wear-Ever" Aluminum Roaster

Pears, plums, pineapples — all can be "put up" in the same easy way. In this same Roaster you can steam vegetables, you can roast meat without basting, you can bake fish in the oven, you can bake apples or potatoes on top of the stove, you can use it for a bread box. It is the pan you use every day the year around.

The enormous pressure of rolling mill and stamping machines makes the metal in "Wear-Ever" utensils dense, hard and smooth. They give enduring satisfaction — cannot chip or rust—are pure and safe.

Replace utensils that wear out with utensils that "Wear-Ever"

If "Wear-Ever" utensils are not obtainable at your dealer's, mail us 10 two-cent stamps and we will send you a one-quart "Wear-Ever" Stew-pan — stamps to be returned if pan is not satisfactory. Send today for booklet, "Canning and Preserving" — it tells everything you should know about putting up fruits and vegetables.

Questions and Answers

H. C. F., Panora, Iowa. (1) Who is meant by "us" in the statement: "Let us make man in our own image"? Gen. 1: 26. (2) Did God ever speak to Jesus as he did to Abraham, Moses, Jacob and others? If so, please locate Scripture.

(1) This question was answered July 8. (2) At the baptism the Father said to Jesus: "Thou art my beloved Son. In thee I am well pleased." Luke 3: 22; Mark 1: 11. The utterances at the Transfiguration (Mark 9: 7; Luke 9: 35) seem to have been addressed not to Christ himself, but the disciples. [In Matthew's account of the baptism the same form is used (Matt. 3: 17)]. But whatever kind of communication Jesus had with the Father, it was altogether different from that which any other human being ever had had, or could have. No one could say, as he said: "I and my Father are one" (John 10: 30), or, still more startlingly, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (John 14: 9). We know that Jesus had long periods of communion with the Father. What mystic and beautiful messages passed between them in those prayer vigils we can only wonder. We know that he was, in fact, in constant communion with the Father, for he said: "The Father hath not left me alone" (John 8: 29). Only upon the cross was this perfect communion interrupted. It was from the anguish revealed in that cry from the cross that he had pleaded in the garden to be delivered: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

A. E. B. "Please pray that Jesus will not cast me away, if I confess my sins to him." [From letter to the Prayer League.]

"Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Look up those words, in John 6: 37; read them till they are so vividly photographed upon your inner eye that they shall keep repeating themselves to your brain and finding their healing way down to your troubled heart. Already you know they are true, but your will refuses to let go and rest upon them. They are surer than anything else in the world. Even standing alone they are wonderful enough to bring any soul to peace, but they are backed up by the whole story of the life and death of Jesus, by the gracious messages of his apostles and the promises of his prophets. That is the kind of a God we have, "who forgiveth all thine iniquities." We cannot repeat too often our universal remedy for troubled souls: "Trusting Jesus, that is ALL!" It is understood that before we can really believe that he forgives us we must be willing so far as possible to make right any wrongs we have done to others [see Matt. 5: 23], and to determine to forsake our sins. But to the soul who will "confess and forsake" this sin there is nothing so sure in all the world as that God will "abundantly pardon."

E. J. C., Minneapolis, Minn. 1. Paul's action in going into the temple and purifying himself with the Jews (Acts 21: 26) was a conciliation to Jewish prejudice. To the Jews he became as a Jew that he might gain them to Christ. 2. The Ethiopian woman whom Moses married (Num. 12: 1) was probably a Cushite. Arabia, [illegible] called in Scripture "the land of Cush." It is not absolutely certain that the wife was of the negro type, as some of the Arabians were, for this distinctively different from the negro.

One or two sad friends have written to the Prayer League, asking its members to pray that death might come to relieve them of their sufferings. Such a request we could not, of course, ask our readers to pray. It is probably true that no human [illegible] can be absolutely certain that any [illegible] case is absolutely hopeless, except, perhaps, in cases of terrible wounds in which vital organs have been destroyed or large portions of human tissue detached. But in cases of sickness no matter how severe, the old saying is generally true: "While there is life there is hope." Medical and surgical sciences now accomplish feats which would have been considered miracles a few years ago. And beyond the power of these miracles of science are the miracles of God, which he is still willing to perform. It is right to pray for relief from pain, for deliverance from death. But it would not seem right, except in most extreme cases, to pray for death itself. The days or hours of life might bring the richest soul experience of the years and might, indeed, be necessary to put the finishing touch upon God's preparation of the soul for heaven. If the trouble is other than physical, if it involves the conduct of friends, or financial difficulties, it is still easier to see how God might find ways of relieving the distress. Hearts are changed and blessings received in most undreamed-of ways in response to fervent prayer. These friends would do well to ask, not for death, but for God's "very best" for them and theirs, and particularly that, before death comes, they be made absolutely and jubilantly submissive to his will. This will make their entrance to heaven more glorious, and all eternity for them more glad. Notice further references to these letters in this week's Prayer League department.

Mrs. E. M., Upper Sandusky, Ohio. The passage in Mark 15: 34 is identical with Ps. 22: 1, and commentators express the opinion that it was uttered by the Saviour on the cross not in the current Greek, nor in the Hebrew original, but in the native Syriac, the mother tongue of his earthly life. It was the crisis of his sufferings, the moment in which he "must taste the bitterest of the wages of sin, who did not sin." Contrast this with the cry, "It is finished," in which "the mighty voice of the expiring Redeemer was nothing else but the exultant spirit of the dying victor," perceiving the fruit of his travail and nerving the organs of utterance to an ecstatic expression of its loftiest feelings in the one glorious sentence.

H. F. W. U., Wilson Creek, Wash. Popular belief as well as tradition credits Ezra and his learned associates of the "great synagogue" with the task of collecting the Scriptures of the Jewish Church. It is generally held that the foundation of the present Hebrew canon is due to him. The work of assembling the writings which made up "the Book of the Lord" must have begun before Isaiah's time since he mentions it as a general collection (Isa. 34: 16) to which his own were to be added. It is not clear that there was any definite collection either of psalms or the prophets before the Captivity. Daniel, however, refers to "the books" (Dan. 9: 2), which in his day had apparently been collected as a whole. It is considered quite probable that Nehemiah had a share in gathering the books. Ezra lived about 460 B.C. All that is known of him through Scripture is contained in the last four chapters of the book of Ezra and in Neh. 8, and 12: 26.

Miscellaneous

F. A. W., Port Jervis, N. Y. John the disciple, apostle and evangelist was one and the same person.

I. C. B., South Gardiner, Me. 1. Sun Yat Sen, ex-provisional president of China, is now living in Tokyo; he is said to be unmarried.

F. P., Hadlyme, Conn. Ruppin, an eminent Jewish writer, estimates the present number of Jews in Palestine at 155,000. Ten years ago there were less than 80,000.

Reader, Cohoes, N. Y., writes: "In this city of twenty-five thousand inhabitants, the flag of the United States has been at half mast on the city hall ever since the death of the Pope."

M. A. S., Bronx, N. Y. The author of "My Arab Steed" was Caroline Norton, granddaughter of the celebrated Irish wit, dramatist and statesman, Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

R. B., Valparaiso, Ind. The name "cockpit of Europe" was long ago bestowed on Belgium on account of the many battles that have been waged in that country. Just at present it seems to be emphasizing its claim to the title.

W. H. R., Gastonia, N. C. Napoleon, when he received news of Josephine's death, was in the little island of Elba, to which he was banished in 1814. Josephine died May 29, 1914. Louis Bonaparte, king of Holland, died at Rome May 25, 1846, and was buried at St. Leu.

C. K., Peshtigo, Wis. There has been only one president of the Chinese Republic, Yuan Shi Kai. When the Chinese threw over the old Manchu dynasty Sun Yat Sen became the head of the provisional or temporary government. Yuan was chosen president by election.

A. B., Newark, N. C. Not knowing the circumstances, we cannot express an opinion. It is well to be careful about judging others. Certainly, a mother should protect her daughters from the society of undesirable persons; but there is a possibility of doing a great injustice if we form an opinion concerning others on mere rumor.

J. S. W., East Avon, N. Y. The small letter on some ten-cent pieces at the base of the wreath or the reverse side denotes the mint in which the coin was produced. All the mints, except that at Philadelphia, which has none, have distinguishing letters. C.C. stands for Carson City; S for San Francisco; D for Dahlonega; O for New Orleans.

Mrs. F. D., Fairfax, Okla. A "good American" may be defined as one loyal to the flag, ready to defend it by word or deed, an upholder of the constitution and laws of the country, a guardian of the rights and privileges of the people, a believer in separation of church and state, and one who by his manner of life and course of conduct is an exemplar [illegible] fellows.

THE LADIES' WORLD

Short stories with genuine thrills. A fashion department of real, practical value with May Manton patterns, and a pattern service department. Household helps—menus that work; card catalogue recipes; pure food talks by Dr. Lewis B. Allyn. A children's page. A page by our readers. The story of "Painless Childbirth," the wonderful discovery that is revolutionizing motherhood. And—the ever-popular moving-picture actress contest. Ballots in each issue.

McCLURE'S

McClure's has for months had a highly organized staff working in England and America securing, as regular contributors, a distinguished group of writers. In addition to short stories and special articles, McClure's for the months to come will contain a novel each by Samuel Merwin, Jeffrey Farnol, Mary Roberts Rinehart, George Kibbe Turner.

THE MOTHER'S MAGAZINE

is published by the David C. Cook Publishing Company, and is founded upon its forty years' successful experience in dealing with the most intimate home problems of a constituency of over six million people.

It is not a journal of sociology nor a text-book, but it will bring into your home each year over 1,200 pages of authentic and practical information.

REVIEW OF REVIEWS

The Review of Reviews will help clarify your war news. It is not enough simply to read the daily papers—they tell you practically nothing, or are "yellow." The finely tempered, keen, judicious editorials of Dr. Albert Shaw will help you to formulate a fair, impartial opinion of the rights or wrongs of the contending nations. Special articles by world authorities will give you a vast store of information about particular features of the war—and what led up to it. But above all, the Review of Reviews will keep before you a knowledge of the many important things occurring during the coming year which will have much influence upon your welfare, and which will make world history.

WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION

Three novels begin in the next three numbers of Woman's Home Companion. 1, "The Brown Study," by Grace S. Richmond; 2, "Uneducating Mary," by Kathleen Norris; 3, "The Roving Foot," by Juliet Wilbor Tompkins, a sequel to "Diantha." In March begins the fourth serial novel. Four novels—each at $1.50 in book form—$6.00—all in one year's Companion. Ida M. Tarbell has written a series of six articles, including "The Talkative Woman; a Defense." Anne Morgan writes her first magazine series for the American girl for the Companion. A new service in connection with the Better Babies Bureau of the Woman's Home Companion is unequaled in its help for mothers. It is the woman's helper. Subscription price, $1.50 a year.

PICTORIAL REVIEW

In addition to its wonderful pages of fashions, its remarkable special articles on subjects of peculiar interest to women, its helpful money and labor-saving departments, its great short stories—during the next twelve months Pictorial Review will publish four splendid stories by Maximilian Foster, Kathleen Norris, Corra Harris and Sir Gilbert Parker, each story complete in practically three issues. These stories in book form will cost you $1.50 each. In this one feature alone the million and more subscribers to the up-to-date woman's magazine will receive $6.00 value for only one dollar a year.

HOME NEEDLEWORK MAGAZINE

Are you interested in embroidery, knitting, crochet, lacemaking, stenciling and all that sort of thing?

Would you like to have each month a magazine that gives you page after page of beautiful designs for dainty lingerie, clear instructions and practical suggestions for making all sorts of pretty things for yourself, your children, your home and your friends?

If you answer "yes" to these questions, Home Needlework Magazine will be worth to you ten times its cost.

THE MODERN PRISCILLA

The Modern Priscilla is a woman's magazine which is distinctly different from the rest.

It is a magazine that specializes in two subjects that interest more women than all others—Fancy Work and Housekeeping.

The woman who loves to beautify her own and her children's clothes at small expense; the woman who loves to beautify her home; the woman who wants to do her housework in the easiest and most economical way—all these women need The Modern Priscilla.

THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE

These nine extra features make certain that the year 1914-1915 will be the biggest in the history of the American Magazine: 1. A new series on Business, by Ida M. Tarbell, the greatest she has ever written. 2. A new novel, his first, by David Grayson. 3. Human Stories from the Greatest War, by Will Irwin. 4. Studies of the newest Science, by Cleveland Moffett. 5. Regular contributions of the four laughing philosophers—Dunne, Leacock, Fitch and Flagg. 6. Interesting People, the most popular Department of the Magazine. 7. The stories of Emma McChesney by Edna Ferber. 8. The Dorothy Stories, by Maravene Thompson; and 9. Beautiful illustrations, many in color, by well-known artists. Subscription price, $1.50.

THE HOUSEWIFE

is pre-eminently a magazine for the woman who has the care and development of home at heart. Its stories are interesting, entertaining, helpful, wholesome and clean, and are replete with suggestions for home decorations, entertainment and amusement. The Housewife has departments on fashions, fancy work, cookery and the care of children. The covers each month are in several colors, and the magazine is printed on high quality of super-calendered paper.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

REV. E. L., MICHIGAN. Pyramid Oil stock is not an investment security. Don't speculate in stocks with fearful odds against them.

H. W. B., VERMONT. Boise Eastern Placer Mining Company stock is not recommended. Quartz mining is hazardous but placer operations are very much more so, especially in the Boise basin.

J. B. C., NORTH CAROLINA. New York Mortgage Company claimholders may expect a dividend before the end of the present year is the information we have obtained from the State Banking Department.

MRS. B. B. M., RHODE ISLAND. Michigan Light Company has an authorized issue of $2,500,000 6 per cent. cumulative preferred stock, and dividends have been paid regularly since organization of the company four years ago. From the most recent reports we see no reason for having the slightest apprehension for the future of this company.

T. T. C., NEW JERSEY. United States Rubber common must be regarded as a risky speculation. But so long as the company continues to earn and pay the present rate of dividends the stock will be considered a highly profitable venture because it will return under these conditions about 10 per cent. on the amount invested. But we should leave it alone.

REV. E. R., MINNESOTA. We have no doubt land in Manatee County can do all the colonization company claims for it. But there are a myriad of seemingly inconsequential things that are liable to occur, any one of which might render the plan unprofitable. Similar schemes have been started in Florida, in Texas and in California, and we have yet to see one single enterprise of this character that has proved to be much of a success. Many have, in fact, been failures.

M. W. J., PENNSYLVANIA. The Prudential Insurance Company of America, Newark, N. J., is one of the soundest insurance companies in the world. You need have no hesitancy in taking out a policy.

D. F. W., OHIO. Stock of the American Automatic Telephone Company (inc.) has no value. The properties of the company were sold on October 20, 1913, by order of the court to W. B. Marvin, of Urbana, Ohio, who is now conducting the business under the name of Automatic Telephone Company (not inc.).

W. L. N., PENNSYLVANIA. We have your letter in regard to your lucky purchase of the stock of the Tonopah Mining Company. You give us some very interesting information. Your investment has turned out to be a most profitable one—so far. The Tonopah Mining Company paid from "grass roots." The company was promoted by able and honest men, with unlimited capital, and the enterprise was founded on one of the richest gold discoveries in Nevada. But in a way the success of this company has been a misfortune. It has lured thousands of people to foolishly invest their money in other Nevada mining companies which have subsequently proven to be utter failures, and the victims lost their money, just as they would have lost it in any other form of gamble. We presume that there have been not less than five thousand mining companies floated in Nevada since Tonopah was discovered ten years ago. These companies sold millions of shares of stock to innocent investors. Probably there are less than twenty mining companies in Nevada today that are engaged in productive operations. There are probably less than ten gold mining companies in the State that are paying dividends to their owners. It has been estimated that more than four hundred million dollars has been put into worthless Nevada mining stocks.

A COUNTRY SABBATH

O THE rest of a country Sabbath day!
Its memories gently loom
Through the hurry and fret of the noisy years,
Like a field of clover bloom.
Then the great, big world seemed fuller of good
Than any man deserves,
And we did not know we were breathing air,
And we knew not we had nerves.

Didn't feel we must get somewhere away
To cool our brains from care,
It seemed that we had everything,
That we were everywhere.
The skies above dropped down content,
And peace looked up from the sod,
And the whole wide earth in its trees and flowers
Seemed fresh from the hands of God.

How restful all those Sunday hours,
When we did not hear a sound,
Save now and then the cock's proud crow
Or the pigeons whirling round,
Or a brown thrush sang his cheery song
From the birch near the old stone wall,
But your ear grew used to all these things
And there seemed no sound at all.

In the morning we drove with the span of grays
O'er the creek by the silent mill,
To the little church near the tombstones white,
Where it always seemed so still.

We had Sunday school, and the preacher spoke,
And closed with the silent prayer,
When it seemed that the angels with folded wings
Were filling the peaceful air.

In the afternoon father sat and read;
As I tip-toed near I could see
His glasses had fallen half down his nose,
As his Bible lay on his knee;
Tired mother had lain down awhile,
Little Sis had crawled in at her door;
Jackie pillowed his head on Rover's back,
Both asleep on the kitchen floor.

I'd lie in the orchard with paper or book,
With the breeze and the bird and the bee;
The world far away, but the earth so near
It seemed like a cradle to me;
And I just a babe lying sweetly at rest,
And the good Lord bending above,
Like a mother crooning a slumber song;
I forgot everything but his love.

There was lots of work and we grew so tired
Through the long week's other days!
But at just the right time the Sunday came
With its rest and its quiet ways;
And when clamor and roar of the noisy years
Have passed like a dream away,
Then I think death will be like the coming again
Of a country Sabbath day.

"SAVORY"

The Roast Word

For Meat, Fish or Fowl

THERE'S a great difference between a roast done in an ordinary roaster and one done in a SAVORY. With the ordinary utensil water is added, and frequent basting by hand—in the face of the hot open oven—is a necessity. Besides the tryingness of this, each basting operation causes a loss of much of the rich, juicy, meaty flavor. But if a SAVORY Roaster is used, no water is needed, no hand basting is necessary, as the meat is self basted in the fragrant steam of its own juices, which are cooked through and through the roast, none being allowed to escape, as the cover is kept closed and is practically air tight. Thus the roast, when done, has a richer flavor—not found in meat roasted in any other way. Two million women are using and endorse

The SAVORY Roaster

Due to its self-basting, self-browning, and flavor-preserving process of roasting, it makes a first-class roast from even a second choice cut. Thus the SAVORY brings better tasting meats for less money. Requires practically no attention when in use, and its shiny-smooth oval bottom can be cleaned as easily as a china dish. Handled by practically all hardware and general stores and recommended by them. Ask for the SAVORY Roaster — and remember there is only one SAVORY.

BEFORE YOU START THE FIRES

IF you start the furnace too soon in the fall, the house gets hot and stuffy. Yet, if you wait, likely enough a sudden cold snap comes and the whole family is shivering and catching colds. It's for these "between seasons" of fall and spring you need a PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER.

Start it in the morning and in five minutes your bedroom is as cozy as your bed. Take it in the bathroom and bathe and dress in comfort. Carry it anywhere—it brings the heat right where it is needed.

More than twelve years ago, The STANDARD OIL COMPANY adopted the PERFECTION HEATER as its standard. Today, it is used in more than two million homes.

The PERFECTION HEATER costs little to buy and little to use. It burns kerosene, a fuel that is ideal because it is low priced, efficient, easy to handle and everywhere available. One gallon gives ten hours' glowing warmth. Think of it! An hour a day for ten days. It is made so that it will not smoke or smell; handsomely finished; it will last indefinitely.

For sale everywhere by hardware and furniture dealers, general and department stores. Ask your dealer to show you one.

Like all good things, PERFECTION HEATERS are imitated. Be sure you get the real thing. Look for the TRIANGLE TRADE MARK.

Chalmers-1915 "Light Six"

Quality First

Chalmers "Light Six" 6-passenger Touring Car, $1725
Fully Equipped f. o. b. Detroit

The Real Quality of a Car Shows in Its Good Looks

Stand on the main thoroughfare of any city. Watch the many makes of cars as they flash by. Most of them pass without notice from the people in the street.

Then comes some thoroughbred of motordom. People turn to look. You hear them say, "What car is that?" or "Isn't that car a beauty?"

You probably have paid that tribute to the motor car thoroughbreds yourself.

And if you happen to be the owner of such a car, you have felt a glow of pride—the just pride everyone feels in possessing a superior and distinctive thing.

A motor car advertises your judgment. If people don't admire it, you soon tire of even the highest priced car. But if people in the street stop to praise its grace and beauty; if your friends tell stories of its fine performances; if your wife's friends laud its comfort, then you are glad to say, "That is my car."

And such a car is the 1915 Chalmers "Light Six."

Here is a car that has striking smartness and beauty. Owners of other cars praise the sweep of its molded oval fenders. Passersby stop to enjoy the grace of its perfectly blended lines. Experts delight in its silent, vibrationless power—its rare "lightness of foot."

And now we offer you the 1915 "Light Six" with a new and distinctive body—the 6-passenger touring car.

The distinctive Chalmers-design body—amply roomy for six people—is fitted with unusually wide doors. The tonneau is equipped with Pullman disappearing seats. The upholstery is deep and luxurious.

Mechanically, the larger "Light Six" Touring Car is the same as the 5-passenger model of which over 4000 have been delivered to owners since May.

The "Light Six" has been proved in more than 3,000,000 miles of service. It is the one 1915 car with an aggregate mileage great enough to prove beyond doubt that it has strength for every emergency, power to spare, and the easy riding qualities of cars costi much more.

We offer the 6-passenger Touring Car as we do all Chalmers cars—as a real quali car, comparable with cars of much great cost. This new "Light Six" is not sold price alone, but on quality—unusual valu at an extremely low price.

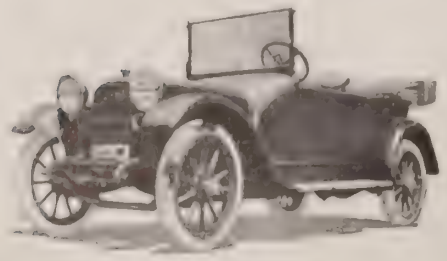
You can buy a car of this passenger-capaci for less money. But the difference you pay to g a Chalmers will be returned to you in the add pleasure and satisfaction of owning a car of who looks and performance you can always be prou

If you pay less than Chalmers prices, y must be satisfied with less than Chalme quality.

You will better appreciate that fact after y have seen and ridden in the 1915 Chalmers ca Your local Chalmers Dealer will give you t Chalmers Test Ride at your own convenien He is now showing the 1915 "Light Six" a 1915 "Master Six" in several styles. Do t fail to see the new Chalmers models.

1915 "Light Six"—5-passenger Touring Car, $1650; 1915 "Light Six"—6-passenger Touring Car, $1725; 1915 "Light Six"—2-passenger Coupelet, $1900; 1915 "Light Six"—5-passenger Sedan, $2750; 1915 "Light Six"—7-passenger Limousine, $3200; 1915 "Master Six"—5-passenger Torpedo, $2400; 1915 "Master Six"—7-passenger Touring Car, $2400. Fully equipped f. o. b. Detroit

Chalmers Motor Company, Detroit



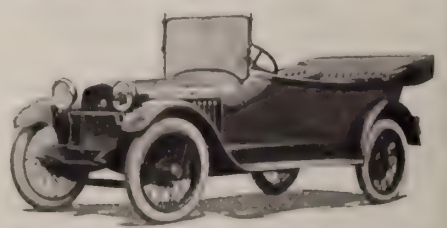
1915 "Light Six" 5-passenger Touring Car—$1650

Of this model, over 4,000 cars have been sold since it was announced in May. On quality alone the 1915 "Light Six" won its position as the fastest selling "Six" on the market. In actual service, it has justified our belief that the 1915 "Light Six" is the greatest all-around automobile for the money since motor cars were first built. See this wonderful "Light Six" at your local Chalmers Dealer's. He will offer you every facility for a thorough inspection of Chalmers quality.

$1915 "Light Six" Limousine—$3200

Chalmers enclosed cars for 1915 offer a rare degree of beauty and exclusiveness at medium prices. The 7-passenger "Light Six" Limousine is the equal, we believe, in looks and comfort of any car on the market. Mounted on a special "Light Six" chassis of 132-inch wheel base, it is amply large for 7 people—5 in the rear compartment. The interior is fitted with Pullman disappearing seats and finished in handsome imported whipcord.

The Chalmers "Light Six" is also built in 5-passenger inside drive Sedan at $2,750, and 2-passenger Coupelet at $1,900.



1915 Chalmers "Master Six" 5-passenger Torpedo—$2400

The larger Chalmers "Six" for 1915 is offered in two body types—both unusually beautiful and distinctive.

The 5-passenger Torpedo is of the foreign "boat" design—unusually smart and racy. This beautiful new body has a single door in either side. Front seats are divided to afford easy passage. The whole car is built lower than usual, giving it unusual and exclusive style.

On the "Master Six" chassis is also built a 7-passenger Touring Car—a big, roomy car, for those who desire an automobile of maximum carrying capacity. The lines of the 7-passenger car are the same as those of the Torpedo. It also is priced at $2,400.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Independance Belge

THE President of the United States, early in September, assumed a position of world importance in international affairs.

The Belgian commission to visit the United States has been given formal audience, official communications from the German Emperor and the President of the French Republic received and replied to, and finally, and far more important, the President has been able to take the preliminary steps in seeking to bring about peace between the combatants.

Before we embark on the really important subject, the preliminary steps to bringing about peace, it may be well briefly to review the reception of the Belgian delegates and the correspondence with the heads of the States of France and Germany.

The Belgian Government has, as my readers know, made certain charges concerning atrocities alleged to have been committed by the German army during its invasion and occupation of Belgian territory, and in order to give wider knowledge of these complaints, has appointed an official commission to lay these complaints formally before our government.

This commission duly arrived in the United States, and proceeding to Washington was received by the President. Before the arrival of this commission, the President had received an official communication from the Emperor of Germany, in which the Emperor formulated certain complaints regarding alleged violations of the rules of war by the Allies, and the President of France had also sent an official communication wherein he, after traversing the allegations of the Emperor, also made counter accusations of a similar character against Germany and Austria.

The President extracted himself from the embarrassing position in which these attempts to constitute him the judge of these several accusations placed him, with grace, dignity and force, and without abandoning in one iota the attitude of strict, though friendly, neutrality which he has from the beginning so strictly preserved. This result cannot but add to the President's personal influence among the combatants, which fact will make more probable the success of his more important effort.

BRITISH VOLUNTEERS DRILLING NEAR LONDON

My readers will remember that at the outbreak of hostilities the President offered his good offices to the combatants, and that then they were respectfully declined. A few days ago, through our ambassador at Berlin, the President renewed, in an unofficial and friendly manner, these efforts to bring about peace, and our ambassador, the Emperor being absent, initiated the matter with the German Chancellor, whose office corresponds with that of the prime minister in England.

Necessarily, this initiative was taken in that delicate and tactful manner which its character and importance demanded. To this démarche the chancellor, after due consideration, returned an answer, on its face apparently non-committal, but containing vaguely the elements of an accommodation, to the effect that the President should undertake to obtain from the Allies a statement of the terms on which the Allies would make peace. The chancellor is reported to have said that Germany would consider only such a peace as would be a lasting peace.

The weakness in this statement is that it is by the chancellor only, and not by the Emperor, and that there is no affirmative statement by the chancellor, whose authority is very limited, that the Emperor either knew of the original démarche or had authorized the reply. The Emperor has said that Germany would make no peace which would involve any cession of German territory, the dismantling of her navy, the payment of money indemnity or the restricting of German commercial activities.

England, through her king, defined her attitude on Friday, September 18, in the royal speech proroguing Parliament, to be, to use the king's own words: "After every effort of my government to preserve the peace of the world, I was compelled, in the assertion of treaty obligations which had been deliberately set at nought, and for the protection of public law in England, to go to war. We are fighting for a worthy purpose and will not lay down our arms until this purpose is achieved."

Lord Kitchener, in his speech in the British Parliament, September 17, at which time he knew of the efforts of the President, said, "The war will be a long one." It has been stated that England will never consent to peace until Germany has been thoroughly subjugated and stripped of her power to disturb Europe.

The Czar has said, it is reported, also after knowing of these efforts, that Russia cannot make peace alone; that what she, for her part, will require is a large money indemnity, the cession of all Polish territory, both by Germany and Austria, etc., etc.

There has been no definite statement by France as to the terms she might consider, nor do we know what might be acceptable to Japan, Servia or Belgium. The Allies are bound by agreement not to make peace separately and so are Germany and Austria. Japan and England have a like agreement.

I have summarized all the facts which seem to be indicative of the position of the various combatants on this question of peace, because it is advisable to have them in mind before we begin to examine into the possibility of the success of the present efforts.

A brief glance at the military and material situation is also necessary to enable us to judge intelligently.

Beginning with England. This Power holds and can continue to hold control of the sea, with all that implies. She has hardly begun to touch her resources in men or money. She can continue the war indefinitely.

Russia is not quite in so good a position. She has plenty of men, and money can always somehow be found in her case. Her great difficulty is her lack of equipment and officers for more men than she now has in the field. Neither of these can be produced in a day. Her army has shown that in anything like equal numbers it cannot hold its own with the Germans. It may be fairly doubted whether under the same conditions it can master the

REMOVING GERMAN PRISONERS OF WAR

VICTIMS OF THE WAR

TYPE OF EAST INDIAN SOLDIERS AIDING ENGLAND

A SECTION OF RUINED LOUVAIN, BELGIUM

Austrian. In food resources, Russia is amply supplied.

France has plenty of money, but she has not fast mail out. Her territory has been and is being devastated, and probably will continue to be for some time. Her food resources are gone, and she is in a position to obtain supplies from the outside world. But she is approaching a state of military exhaustion, though she is not there yet. Two months more and she will be. Her situation is, therefore, far and away the worst of the Allies.

For the purposes of this inquiry, the resources of Belgium are of little account one way or another. Said are those of Servia.

Austria produces food enough for herself, and has an appreciable surplus. This is important, as neither she nor Germany at present have free access to the sea. She has suffered defeats at the hands of the Russians, but in a strategic sense these defeats are not important, and Russia has constantly exaggerated their consequences and results. It must be remembered that practically all the news we have from there comes through Austrian hands. Paris or Petrograd, and the enemy's optimism of the movements or resources of the opponent in war must be not always to be relied upon. Knowing Austria pretty well, I do not think she is anything like as near to the exhaustion point as Petrograd would have us believe. Her supply of men is not exhausted.

Germany is outmanded except in the marshes of East Prussia. Her navy is untouched practically. She has enough funds and she has about $400,000 more now available, if she needs the same cable France has made.

One more fact: there has been no decisive victory or defeat for either side yet.

My readers now have the facts before them essential to forming an opinion as to whether or not the psychologic moment for peace has as yet arrived. For myself, and this is so purely a personal opinion that I hesitate to intrude it, I think not. But I do think Mr. Wilson has taken the first step that is a reasonable time, say a couple of months, may lead to other steps which will result in concord succeeding discord.

When we finished our consideration of the military situation last week, the German position began somewhere near Château Thierry in the west, and thence ran easterly through Epernay, Châlons and Clermont to Verdun, and thence turning a little to the southeast, through Lunéville to the Vosges Mountains.

A week later, this same line begins at Noyon on the west and runs eastwardly along the Aisne River, and thence in a continuation of the line of that river to Laon and Montfaucon, a little to the north of Verdun, and thence turning southeasterly the line runs to Château Salins in Lorraine.

As compared with the high-water mark of their invasion of France, the German forces have now retreated some forty-four miles, Meaux to Noyon on its extreme right end. At the end of the right wing, Sezanne to Laon, about sixty miles, and in the middle of the center, Vitry le François to Rethel approximately fifty-seven miles. The retreat on the end of the center, and of the left wing in its entirety, has been insignificant, some ten or twelve miles at most.

The details of the week's fighting are very difficult to give in sequence. There has been a slow but steady German retreat, interrupted only at places along the line by a stand on their part. Though the history of the week is thus quickly told in words, it has, nevertheless, been a week of most deadly fighting, and the toll in human lives has been heavy.

In three days, September 12 to 14, the English loss, as admitted by them, alone runs to 3,500 men on an effective force in the field of about 165,000. What must the German and French losses have been, if the same ratio held true? Assuming the German force at 650,000, before reinforcements commenced to arrive in the middle of the week, their loss would be about 26,000 and the French would have much exceeded that figure. As closely as it is possible to estimate the Allies during the early part of the week outnumbered the Germans by nearly four hundred thousand, since not only was the entire French field army engaged, besides the British forces, but the garrison of Paris took part as well. During the first half of the week the Allies regained possession

TOUCHED by the pitiful case of the women and children of Europe who have been bereaved of their breadwinners by the great war, the golden-hearted women of America are organizing for their relief. Letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, received during the past week, show that the great heart of the nation has been deeply moved by the stories of suffering. E. C. M., Maryland, sends $1 and writes, "I feel it my duty to send a small gift to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the widows and children sufferers through the war in Europe. It is my prayer that the war may soon cease." C. M. P., Worcester, Mass., sends $5 "for the Silent Sufferers." W. K. D., Allentown, Pa., enclosed a check for $25, "trusting that the money will flow in by the thousands for this worthy cause." A. T., Hettinger, N. D. ($1), writes, "You are doing a great work by getting up a Fund for the Silent Sufferers, and I am sure God will bless the work. How thankful and glad we should be to think God spares us from such sorrows in our own country."

A. P. N., Sharpsburg, Md. ($1): "I see by your paper you are raising a Fund for Europe's war widows and orphans. What cause could possibly be worthier and more pleasing to our heavenly Father? I thank God that I am privileged to give something in the name of the Lord. Accept my mite with the prayer that God will increase it many times." Mrs. M. I. K., Red Oak, Texas, writes: "I am sending you $1 for the widows and orphans of this terrible war. I am a war widow myself and an old subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD." M. E. O., Greenville, Ill. (50c.), writes: "My heart goes out to the Silent Sufferers and I wish I had plenty of money so I could give more. I pray that those who have large means will open their hearts and give large amounts. At least I can pray for them that this terrible war will soon stop and peace reign again in all lands." Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Y., Portsmouth, Va., writes: "Enclosed is $2 to apply to the Widows' and Orphans' War Relief Fund. God grant that this mite may help some in relieving the great distress."

Mrs. Nina L. Duryea, daughter-in-law of General Hiram Duryea, U.S.A., in a letter from Dinard, France, dated September 1, in the New York Times, tells of the misery and suffering among the refugees throughout that section of war-swept Europe. She says: "Yesterday I saw three hundred Belgian refugees, headed by the Mayor. I try to write calmly of that procession of the half-starved, terror-ridden throng." They had come all the way from Charleroi and Mons—old men, women and little children—not a man of strength or middle age among them. Mrs. Duryea's letter resumes: "Such a procession! They had slept in fields, eaten berries, carrots dug from the earth by their hands; drunk from muddy pools."

Some of the stories of suffering she relates are heartrending. There was one newly-widowed, heartbroken wife with her little year-old babe, the latter gasping out its tiny life. Another was a young girl in the remnants of a dress, hatless, shoeless, with feet bleeding, and insane from all the horror she had passed through. On a bench sitting in a row, were seven little girls, mere children, all of them fatherless, motherless, homeless, and none old enough to tell a coherent story of whence they came or to whom they belonged. One old man arrived in the city with a small delivery cart pulled by a big dog, and in the vehicle was all he had saved from the wreck of his home—a coat, photographs of his wife and three sons and the old brass kettle.

WIDOWED AND FATHERLESS

Your Peace Sunday Collections, October 4, Should Help Thousands of Such

Mrs. Duryea makes a strong appeal to the women of America to aid these helpless ones. Paris, she says, is besieged by a great army of refugees who have filled every nook and corner and are still pouring in in large numbers. The pity of the town people has gone out to these poor, and they have crowded them into every available place of shelter, holding that such service is due to "those who suffer for honor's sake." "There are organizations for helping the soldiers, but none for helping these victims of the war," she writes. "Fifty cents will buy shoes for a baby's feet, ten cents will buy ten pieces of bread, $1 will buy a widow a shawl; deny yourselves some little pleasure and send the money to these starved people, innocent of any crime. You American women, who tuck your children into their clean beds at night, remember these children, reared as carefully as yours, many of them now without relatives, money or future. By and by they will be placed on farms to do peasants' work with peasants."

Another correspondent writes from Paris on August 30: "Along the wide road just east of Beauvais, before it passed Compiègne and before it takes on the current of traffic from the farther northeast, a multitude of peasants, women folk and children, in hay ricks, donkey carts, buggies, men and older boys afoot, poured toward the country behind Beauvais. In parts of the road there were twenty cart loads to the mile, every cart cushioned with enough newly cut oats and provender to keep the horses and oxen going two or three days, and weighted down with very little by way of household effects, except linen, feather bedding and bundles of clothes."

Few Americans can realize the conditions that prevails in Europe at this time. France is drained of its crops for the year; Switzerland faces famine at an early date; Germany has lost her breadwinners; Belgium has to face all these losses, and in addition, a complete crippling of her commerce and trade, which affects all classes. The little shops in the small towns are closed, for the places where they get their supplies are burnt or are in the besieged cities. Many of the peasants are living in hopeless misery, just where the war found them. But in the earlier stages of the war great numbers rolled up their belongings in blankets, put on their best clothes, took the family horse or harnessed a pair of strong dogs and made for the nearest seaport town.

"At Ostend," an eye-witness states, "families are living in the little bath-houses about 6 by 6 feet or smaller on the beach; about two hundred of them will spend the winter there. The winter is not quite so cold as in New York, but it is cold enough, plenty of snow and ice. They brought nothing from home, for their property was all destroyed, including the cattle, poultry and pigs that were taken for food. We shall try our best to help them. Forty dollars will keep a family in food for the winter there. The rich cannot aid the poor as in other countries, for they, too, have lost their own property in many, many cases."

THE NEARNESS OF GOD

A SERMON

BY

Rev. J. W. Chapman, D.D.*

"Thou art near, O Lord." Ps. 119 : 151

THIS text is taken from one of the longest psalms in the Bible, and is remarkable not only on account of its length, but because of its teaching. Like the Celestial City, it lieth four square; the height, the depth, the length and the breadth of it are equal. There is but one general theme in the psalm and that is the Word of God, and as we study it carefully, it reminds us of nothing so much as a diamond which, as you hold it up and as the light touches it from every side, sends out to all beholders the evidences of its beauty and worth, and this 119th Psalm is a great and ever changing illustration of the Word of God, for almost every verse refers in some way to God's Word; and it is mentioned under the figure of law, or testimonies, or word, or precepts, or statutes. It is indeed most remarkable.

The writer of this psalm must have been fairly saturated with the Word of God and his speech overflows with his knowledge of it. I have heard of an old Christian who had meditated his way through the Bible three times; surely such a familiarity with God's Word is the secret of a holy and a happy life! Years ago, at the time of a great political excitement in England, William Wilberforce made this note in his diary, "I have walked this morning from Hyde Park corner repeating the 119th Psalm and am having great comfort." Martin Luther said in commenting on this psalm, "David must have shaken every fruit tree in God's garden and gathered fruit therefrom." Like other portions of the Scripture, this psalm has been very differently named. It has been called the Alphabet of Divine Love, perhaps because of its division, for it is separated into groups of eight verses and each group is under a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, the divisions continuing until the alphabet is exhausted.

Through one hundred and fifty verses David has been speaking of all these things, and has been talking of God, when suddenly, as if he were impressed with the fact that he of whom he had been speaking was near, he cries out in the words of our text, "Thou art near, O Lord." It is a possible thing for one to preach so constantly that he fairly loses sight of him of whom he speaks; or for a Sunday school teacher to teach her lesson and become so familiar with the truth as to be almost unconscious of the presence of Christ, of whom she has been teaching. It is a good thing for us all to stop again and again and say, "Thou art near, O Lord," for he is indeed nearer to us than any earthly friend.

The Sense of God's Presence

THERE ARE CERTAIN TEXTS in the Scripture which are akin to the one I have chosen, as for example, Ps. 121: 5, "The Lord is thy keeper; the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand." If the Lord is our keeper, why need we go astray, for he neither slumbers nor sleeps? Ps. 34: 18 is another text, "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit." I am sure I am speaking for you all when I say we have never had a heartache, if we have accepted our discipline as he intended we should, that he has not been graciously near to us. Philippians, the fourth chapter and the fifth verse, the last clause, is another illustration and is very much like the text. "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand." Paul has been speaking of peace and the joy of Christian friendship, when suddenly he speaks out like David of old, "The Lord is at hand," and immediately he begins with this sentence, "Be careful for nothing." Of course, we need be careful for nothing if the Lord is at hand, for he will bear every burden; he will be with us constantly and help us to overcome every trial.

The 23d Psalm is another beautiful illustration. It has been my privilege recently to sit by the deathbed of a young man who has since passed out into eternity, and when I told him the end had come for him, he said, "It is a long journey to make alone, is it not?" My only answer was this 23d Psalm, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me," and he brushed the tears out of his eyes and said, "Then I am not afraid," nor need we be at any time, for he is always with us.

The Lord by Our Side

WE learn by contrast to admire many things. I have read that "those who have studied the paintings of Sir Noel Paton must have observed that part of their peculiar beauty lies, by a trick of art, in their partial ugliness. There are flowers and birds, knights and ladies, gossamer winged fairies and children of seraphic beauty; but in the corner of the canvas, or just at their feet, some uncouth and loathsome form—a toad, a lizard, a slimy snail—to lend, by contrast with its repulsiveness, a lovelier beauty to the rest. So in ancient sculpture, the griffin and the dragon grin among the angel faces on the cathedral front, heightening the surrounding beauty by their deformity. Many of the literary situations of the New Testament powerfully exhibit this species of contrast. The twelve disciples—one of them is a devil. Jesus upon the cross, pure and regal—on either side a thief. And here, as conspicuously, in this fifteenth chapter of Luke, the most exquisite painting in the Bible is touched off as a mere dramatic situation." And so here we understand better that the Lord is by our side when we imagine for a moment that he is away from us. In Ps. 118: 6 we read, "The Lord is on my side; I will not fear; what can man do unto me?" This, of course, is for the child of God, but in Prov. 15: 29 we read, "The Lord is far from the wicked; but he heareth the prayer of the righteous." God pity us if we stand in this position. In Ps. 145: 18 we read, "The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth," while if we would know the contrasting statement for those who are not yet children of God we have the solemn statement in Prov. 1: 28, "Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me."

His Nearness in Christ

THERE ARE SO MANY WAYS in which he is near to us. First: In creation. It is a great mistake, however, to think that we can find enough of God in nature to satisfy our souls, for we cannot. There is a verse written by Browning, if I mistake not, in which he says something like this: "Earth is crammed with Heaven and every bush is set on fire with God." But it is a great mistake to seek to find him only in this way. He is near to us in providences, and as a rule for the Christian God is never nearer than when we pass through trial. We sometimes see farther through our tears than in any other way, for they are like telescopes. But he is nearer, of course, in Jesus Christ.

First: He is near as a sin-forgiving God. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Romans 8: 1. The thought of the judgment is something awful, but let it be remembered that the word "condemnation" is the same in the Greek as "judgment," and for those who are in Christ Jesus, whatever their sins, judgment is forever past.

Second: He is near as a promise-keeping God. "For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us." II Corinthians 1: 20. There is not in all the exigencies of our lives a trial that cannot be offset by a promise of help found in the Bible, and these all center in Him.

Third: He is near as a prayer-answering God. John 16:23, 24, "And in that day ye shall ask me nothing. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full." This is God's own word, and if our prayers have not been answered the difficulty is with ourselves, and never with him.

Fourth: He is near as a gracious Father. John 14:9, 10, "Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself; but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works." By these words Jesus wanted Philip to know that when he had seen him touch the eyes of the blind and raise the dead and comfort the sorrowing he had had a vision of the Father in his infinite love.

His Nearness to Help and Preserve

HE IS NEAR AND HE WILL PRESERVE. Psalm 37: 23-25, "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; and he delighteth in his way. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down; for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand. I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." It is written in the Bible, and God's word is always true. Psalm 121: 3, "He will not suffer thy foot to be moved; he that keepeth thee will not slumber." We may not be conscious of his nearness, but he is near just the same. We have sometimes been in a dark room all alone, nothing about us, then have touched the electric button, and suddenly we realized that the furnishings of the room were on every side of us. We were not conscious of them, but they were near. Some of us have lost the consciousness of God, and yet, if we had but time to illumine the place where we live, we would see all about us the evidence of his presence, peace, pardon, love, joy.

Oh that we might live in the furnished room of God, for he is near protecting us, defending us, keeping back the pestilence, and so turning aside the arm of death from us! Trouble may come very near, but it cannot overthrow us. In Psalm 27: 2 there is a graphic description of this. "When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat my flesh, they stumbled and fell." The psalmist has a vision of the enemy coming fiercely against him, just about to lay their hands upon him, when suddenly they stumble and fall. Then in the 12th chapter of Acts there is a picture of Peter sleeping between the two soldiers. Herod is just about to lay hands upon him to bring him out, when suddenly the chain snaps and he is free. This is just like God. Trouble almost breaks our hearts, but not quite; reason is almost dethroned but not altogether. He will not suffer us to be cast down and utterly forsaken.

What a help! If we could only get into the way of saying over and over, "Thou art near, O Lord," we should be greatly strengthened. First: It would keep our lives pure, for we would not so frequently be yielding to sin if we were conscious of his nearness. Second: It would strengthen us in the hour of our temptation to stop and say over and over, "Thou art near, O Lord," for he would immediately give us the strength to escape. Third: It will greatly help us in trial to say, "Thou art near, O Lord."

It would greatly assist in the transformation of character if we but realized his nearness. Moses saw him, and his face shone; Paul had a vision of him, and he never was the same again.

One of my friends in preaching to the soldiers in the time of the war visited a hospital, and was asked by a nurse if he would not, when he had finished his service, cross over to an adjoining hospital and minister to the comfort of a dying boy. He agreed to come and finished his service with the soldiers by joining with them in singing "Jesus, Saviour, Pilot Me." When he reached the second hospital tent the nurse told him that the young soldier was dead, and he died, she said, "as you sang the last hymn. While you were singing it he said it with you." And this was the hymn:

> When at last I near the shore,
> And the fearful breakers roar
> 'Twixt me and the peaceful rest,
> Then while leaning on thy breast,
> May I hear thee say to me,
> "Fear not, I will pilot thee!"

There is one plain, personal, practical question I would leave with you. Do you know Him? I

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, October 4. Mark 7: 34. "Ephphatha, that is, Be opened." Unusual preparations were made by our Lord before he proceeded to speak the liberating word to the poor deaf-mute whom he had met in the territory of the Ten Cities. First, he takes the man aside from the multitude. The deaf-mute is now face to face with his only Helper. Next, our Lord puts his fingers into the deaf ears, spits, touches the speechless tongue, looks up to heaven, and sighs. The man looks on, and a sense is conveyed to him of his great misery which touches the compassionate heart of Jesus, and also of the source whence his restoration must come—heaven. The Sin-bearer was always moved to pity when beholding the ravages of sin among men. And now, when the attention of this poor cripple is fully roused, the divine order goes forth which unstops those ears and loosens that tongue. The word Ephphatha is spoken "to him." The Lord treats the deaf as if they hear, just as he called to Lazarus in the tomb as if he were living. The call of Jesus is a vitalizing summons, a quickening word. O Jesus, speak thy mighty Ephphatha to me; burst in me every fetter of sin and remove every impediment to the free movement of every part of my spiritual man that has been caused by sin. Make my dull ears to hear the tidings of thy salvation, and fill my palsied tongue and lips with songs of thy deliverance!

MONDAY, October 5. Matthew 15: 32. "I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat: and I will not send them away fasting, lest they faint in the way." The account of the feeding of the four thousand is in many points similar to that of the feeding of the five thousand, which Matthew had related in the preceding chapter. Again our Lord takes the disciples into his counsel. Without asking them a direct question, he tests their faith in him also on this occasion. He reveals to them his truly human heart which can be touched with the feeling of men's infirmities. What he tells them about the poverty of their guests and the danger they were in of succumbing to exhaustion were thoughts that had likely suggested themselves to the disciples as they moved among the multitude, making their observations. God and men had been studying the situation: to the latter it spelt disaster, to the former it issued a call for help. The Lord gives the disciple a glimpse of his omniscience and compassionate providence, which is ever busy averting harm from the children of men. Moreover, these people had risked hunger and starvation in their desire to hear Jesus. They had been seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; it was, therefore, in accord with Jesus' promise, "All these things shall be added unto you," that he should provide for their physical wants. What has interested close readers of the Bible in this narrative is, whether the disciples have learned a lesson from the feeding of the five thousand. It seems not; for they meet our Lord's remark with many objections. God must repeat his lessons of mercy and power many times before the dull heart of man begins to understand and appreciate his doings.

TUESDAY, October 6. Matthew 15: 34. "How many loaves have ye?" The disciples had recited to the Lord difficulties which in their judgment rendered the feeding of the multitude impossible under the circumstances. They had, however, made no impression on Jesus. He does not chide them for their lack of understanding. He addresses himself to the work before him. If the disciples did learn anything from the previous miracle of the five loaves and two fishes, it appears from the fact that they do not, on this occasion, belittle their scanty stores. They give up to the Lord what they have, and induce the few guests who still had a little supply of food to do the same. That was an act of faith, and that faith was rewarded. Calculating selfishness, especially in days of want, will cling tenaciously to its smallest holding, protesting that it cannot give it up even at the most urgent request. The believer remembers the promise, "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again." The rule, "To do good, and to communicate, forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased," applies to all times, and probably was first addressed to poor people. Seasons of want and the day of small things are occasions when the succoring providence of God is most strikingly manifested. Men's perplexities are ever God's opportunities, and the poorest offering in behalf of the Lord has many a time started a stream of heavenly benefactions to descend on a host of sufferers. A beggar's act of faith can prove the salvation of himself and of thousands in like distress with him.

WEDNESDAY, October 7. Matthew 16: 2-4. "When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather: for the sky is red. And in the morning, It will be foul weather today: for the sky is red and lowering. O ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times? A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall be no sign given unto it, but the sign of the prophet Jonah." Religious scruples of an honest seeker after truth appeal to the compassion and charity of Christians, but they elicit just contempt when they are the labored fabrications of the wilfully blind, and serve to cloak their malice. These men from the upper crust of Jewish society, to whom our Lord replies in the text, had heard a similar taunt from the merciful Jesus on previous occasions. They were known to be hostile factions—the Pharisees and the Sadducees—who were bitterly arrayed against each other on every religious question; but they appear to have found a basis of union and co-operation in their common hatred of Christ. As yet they act discreetly. They pretend such deep concern about the Lord's person and mission! Is he really the Messiah? If they could only obtain absolutely convincing evidence for the correctness of the popular belief concerning Jesus! Jesus reminds them that on far less reliable signs they were in the habit of forecasting the weather, even a whole year in advance. They would trust the testimony of their eyes and ears in the affairs of the material world, but when the heavens of God's spiritual world, in which they should have been masters, were full of portentous signs, they stood doubting, debating, denying. Jonah's appearance at Nineveh had brought a heathen city to its senses in a short time. A Jonah-sign would be the last sign accorded these hypocritical inquirers, and that sign would baffle them and put them to utter confusion. Shall we say less to those who in our day deny the Christ that died and rose again?

THURSDAY, October 8. Matthew 16: 6 and Mark 8: 15. "Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees, and of the leaven of Herod." This warning of our Lord shows that the stern words in the preceding meditation were prompted by spiritual anxiety for his followers. Persons of importance in a town, city, or country exercise a great influence for good or evil on the common people, who observe the actions, repeat the views and pattern their general conduct after the men whom they regard as leaders. An entire community can thus become leavened with the thought of a few men. The attitude which such prominent religionists as the Pharisees and Sadducees, and such powerful men in the state as Herod and his court, assumed toward Christ and his work would tell on Christ's following. Artfully contrived questions such as the Jewish theologians were propounding to Christ, and, the suspicious vigilance with which Herod and the Herodians were watching the growing power of Christ, might shake the implicity of the disciples' faith in the Lord's teaching, and dampen the ardor of their affection for him. Even such sincere followers as the twelve, who were under the constant influence of the Lord's teaching, might become infected with that malicious distrust which animated the great men of the nation. Hence this earnest and cordial warning. Christians have reason to be careful how they looked up to men who question the teaching and character of their Lord.

FRIDAY, October 9. Mark 8: 17-21. "Why reason ye, because ye have no bread? perceive ye not yet, neither understand? have ye your heart yet hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember? When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? How is it that ye do not understand?" In the hurry of their departure from the neighborhood of Capernaum, where our Lord's popularity had become shaken through the teaching and machinations of the Pharisees and Sadducees, the disciples had taken along but one loaf of bread. They connected the Lord's warning against the leaven of the Pharisees, in some incomprehensible manner, with their own scanty provisions. The spiritual import of the warning was lost on them because of their earthly cares, for which they really had no ground, had they stopped to reflect on their past experiences. In strong terms the Lord had to rebuke them for their lack of understanding. It is humiliating to a teacher of religious truth to notice how much ignorance still remains in his pupils, despite his efforts to eradicate it. But if even the consummate teacher from heaven is continually met with dulness among his followers, why should a mere human teacher become disheartened at his failures to make his pupils understand all? It is also a source of distress to every searcher after divine knowledge to observe in himself spots of darkness and unbelief, though he has been, in the main, lighted up with wisdom from on high. Even the disciples were not altogether illumined. Even they knew only in part and prophesied in part, as the greatest of the apostles has declared. Let us keep on reading, hearing, studying, praying for more light. Let us be thankful for every rebuke of our ignorance in spiritual matters. We have deserved it: our apprehension of God's Word should be more nimble and alert, our knowledge more comprehensive, our faith stronger.

SATURDAY, October 10. Mark 8: 26. "Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town." The cure of the blind man at Bethsaida had been effected in a peculiar fashion. Step by step the Lord had led this man to the complete restoration of his sight, thus drawing out and leading on the blind man's faith in him. Now the cure is completed, the Lord issues a command which tests the man's faith. Faith is obedience. The man is not even to go back to the town out of which the Lord had led him by the hand, and is to say nothing to any person of the mercy shown him. This was indeed a hard lesson. Whatever other reasons our Lord may have had for subduing the ardor of the young faith of this man—whether it was dangerous for him to move among his old associates, or dangerous for the people of the town to hear this cure advertised—this much is certain, that the Lord was leading this newly-won disciple another step onward and upward in the school of faith, by teaching him that a true follower of Jesus surrenders all his desires, wishes, inclinations to Jesus, without murmur or repining. It has been rightly said that "if Christ is to be a complete Saviour, he must be an absolute and unquestioned Lord." Also our silences, when imposed by him, are noble acts of faith.

he near to you? Upon your answer depends your peace of mind and your ever-increasing joy. If you do not know him, then I would urge you to become acquainted with him quickly. If you will confess and forsake your sins in the strength and help he is willing to impart to you; if you will accept Jesus as your personal Saviour, believing that when he died it was for you; if you will acknowledge him before men, letting it be known that you are not ashamed to call him Lord; if you will faithfully and fully obey his least command; then you will know him, and this will be the fulness of joy. If he is not near to you, then take a look into your secret life to see what it is that has dimmed your vision, and finding the difficulty, make the wrong right and do it quickly. Then you may say with burning heart and possibly with tear-wet cheeks, "Thou art near, O Lord."

WORK OF LUTHERAN CITY MISSIONS

THIS is a missionary age, thank God! The missionary spirit pervades all Christendom. The Gospel is preached "in all the world for a witness unto all nations." There is still much mission work to be done in our own Christian land. There are those at our very doors who need a spiritual uplift at our hands, and, what is more, such as have entirely strayed from the Shepherd of their souls, and who will not find the way back to the fold unless that power to save, the Gospel, turns them to walk anew the paths of peace. And much is being done throughout the length and breadth of the land to reclaim those who have lost their spiritual bearings and are serving sin and the world. Particularly in our large cities the work of seeking the lost and strayed is carried on with great zeal.

The Lutheran Church is active in this branch of the Lord's work. One thing might be mentioned which is a special feature mainly with the German Lutherans, and which largely serves as a preventive against conditions found in our large centers of population. It is the parochial school. Millions of dollars are expended on these schools, money that might be classed with the sums directly given for the cause of missions and published in the statistics of missions. About 200,000 Lutheran children in this country attend parochial schools, and are thus at an early age panoplied for the welfare against the manifold allurements to sin.

But the Lutherans are also found among the great number of zealous workers in our large cities who are untiring in their efforts to win lost souls back for Christ. In three populous cities of the West, Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Louis, they have been particularly successful in this line of mission work, finding their field of action mostly in the various city institutions. In Chicago institutional mission work was begun by them in 1900. A society was organized to take the matter in hand. It now numbers 1,200 members. They were fortunate in gaining a good man for the work,

BEGINNERS IN LUTHERAN MISSION SCHOOLS

the Rev. A. Schlechte, whose labors have been signally blessed. We find him at work in the Cook County Hospital, the largest of its kind in the country, where he visited about 4,600 patients during the last year; at the County Poorhouse, where 290 souls are under his care, forming a little congregation that regularly assembles for divine worship, a most humble but most attentive audience; at the three Consumptives' Hospitals, two of which are in the suburb of Oak Forest, with their 900 patients, where in the past year he showed 460 dying sufferers the Light that would illumine their path when passing through the valley of the shadow of death; at the Insane Asylum, where he was the first one to hold divine services, in 1904, showing that it was feasible, and where from 250 to 300 gather in the chapels to sing the songs of Zion, say the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in unison, and listen to the plain Gospel truths expounded to them; at the County Jail, where he goes from cell to cell to tell each inmate that where sin hath abounded grace does still more abound, if they will only repent and turn to Jesus.

BESIDES visiting these and other institutions, for instance, private hospitals, the missionary is a frequent visitor at the Juvenile Court to assume custody of what the law terms dependent and delinquent children of Protestant parentage. A casual remark with regard to such children may not be out of place here, which is, that Protestant children taken into this court are often cared for in Catholic institutions, because Protestants, sad to say, frequently are not as willing as are Catholics to provide shelter and a proper schooling for these waifs and orphans. The above-named society lately bought a $25,000 home for the care of such children in a suburban village, where they will be removed from their former evil surroundings. In the society's first home 365 of these children have had a temporary home, 73 of these last year. That Home was erected in 1909. Some of these children are given over to a Lutheran orphanage or Children's Aid Society, while some may be safely given back to their parents sooner or later.

LUTHERAN institutional mission work at Milwaukee has also taken on no mean proportions. Rev. Enno Duemling has been in charge of it for about fifteen years. He is doing the Lord's work of seeking that which was lost, bringing again that which was driven away, binding that which was broken, and strengthening that which was sick in twenty-nine institutions, thirteen of which are hospitals, four sanitariums, five homes of one kind or other, including the Poorhouse, two insane asylums, three prisons, and one industrial school (for girls).

In five of these institutions Pastor Duemling is holding regular services, which were attended by 10,721 inmates last year. He is particularly pleased with the attendance at the State Prison at Waupun, of whose 700 inmates 500 voluntarily attend his services. The majority of those inclosed within the walls of the State Prison at Waupun are young men of the age of from twenty to twenty-three, and the monster evil of drink has made them such pitiable wards of the State. A fellow monster is the dreadful drug habit, most of whose victims are found in the hospitals, sanitariums and insane asylums. To mention only one item, he was at the bedside of thirty-two inmates of the various institutions last year when they breathed their last, telling them of Him who saves to the uttermost.

The institutional mission at St. Louis is carried on in much the same way as at Chicago and Milwaukee. The work here is under the superintendence of Rev. F. W. Herzberger. Many are the souls that have thanked him with tears in their eyes during the fifteen years that he has made his daily rounds through the hospitals of the city, the county poorhouse, and the city jail. And though not a few spurn his offers to help them and give them what they are in need of most, true comfort for their souls, his eyes glisten with joy when at times he is privileged to hear words like these of a dying patient to whom he had shown the Saviour as he is revealed to us in the Gospel: "O how sweet, how sweet! Say it again. O Jesus, have mercy on me, poor dying sinner!"

A SPECIAL feature of the mission here is the work being done in the slums, near the levee. Great success has been scored with a mission school. The missionary found many children among the heterogeneous population of this district that attended no school, their parents being either too poor or too deeply steeped in vice to be concerned about their education. He rented an old store-room, gathered the children he found in the streets and alleys and grimy backyards into his mission quarters, provided them with some neat clothing and shoes, and began to teach them the rudiments of knowledge, not forgetting the one thing needful. And the school flourished. Two teachers are at work there now. The old quarters in our illustration have been exchanged for a three-story dwelling, the first floor being used for both school and chapel, while another nice school-room is on the second floor. The day school is attended by about one hundred children, the Sunday school by about seventy. The results accomplished by this school and Sunday school, as well as by the services held at the chapel on Sunday evenings, for the betterment of the surrounding population, both old and young, are highly gratifying.

GUESTS OF A JUVENILE COURT

A Children's Friend Society organized more than ten years ago supplies the missionary with the necessary means to temporarily take care of homeless infants and children until he has found a home for them where both body and soul will be well provided for. These city missions are doing incalculable good. We need more of them. Thousands upon thousands of men, women, and children more or less beyond the reach, as it were, of our churches and the ministrations of their frequently overburdened pastors need to be sought diligently—remembering that, as St. James says, "he that converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death."

DENOMINATIONAL NEWS FROM THE FIELD

THE European War has not interfered with the work of the missions in the Far East in the opinion of Bishop M. C. Harris, superintendent of the work of the Methodist Church in Japan and Korea, who advises the board that churches in those sections of the world are undisturbed, and regular activities continue.

—ACCORDING TO REPORTS received by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, the situation in West Africa is critical. The West African Mission, with an exception of a single station at Benito, is located at Kamerun, German territory, where fighting is already going on between Germany and the British for possession of this territory. The board has received word from its agents in England that a large shipment of goods, containing milk and quinine, the milk for babies, the quinine for fever, cannot be delivered at Kamerun. Letters mailed to West Africa have been returned undelivered. A group of missionaries who expected to sail the first week in August from Kamerun have been detained. The board does not apprehend any danger to the missionaries in Kamerun, but anxiety is felt because of inability to reach them with supplies.

—THE TREASURER OF THE Syrian Mission informs the board that owing to inability to secure funds, and the absence of many employees of the city, the mission press at Beirut has been closed. Last year the press printed 51,856,958 pages. It is one of the great mission presses of the world. At the present time orders for the complete Bible or portions of the Scriptures were two months in excess of the supply. Syria continues in a state of panic. But through the courtesy of the State Department the board has been enabled to transmit on the United States cruiser North Carolina funds for the treasurer at Beirut. A letter received by the board from Guatemala under date of September 1 says that the city of Guatemala, though far removed from the seat of war, is suffering the financial effects, as Europe was Guatemala's market. Business is at a standstill, work is shutting down, plans for new work are held up and a great many will be idle before long. Prices are going up, and the value of the peso has dropped terribly. Exchange is 25 for one, while six months ago it was 20 to one. It takes 25 pesos to buy $1 gold, and $1 gold will not buy nearly as much as when it was worth 25 pesos.

—DR. DONNELL, curate of St. George's Church, New York City, who has just returned from the scenes of conflict in England and France, is enthusiastic over the treatment accorded Americans in London and Paris. No American has gone without assistance. Women in London are forming sewing societies to sew for the soldiers and their families, and to aid destitute members whose provider has gone to the front. On every side men are mobilizing without uniforms, and marching without music, horses and vehicles occupy the beauty spots of the surrounding country, waiting for the call. On the Sunday before he left London, Dr. Donnell said there were 1,500 people in attendance at St. Paul's Cathedral, where the usual attendance numbered between 200 and 400. Jammed to the limit at 6.15 o'clock, an hour before church time, the doors had to be closed. The Sunday before three militants were dragged from the church.

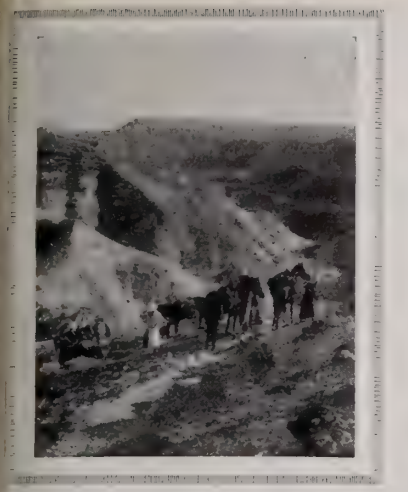
—THE WOMAN'S BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS of the Reformed Church have just sent out two new missionaries, one to China and another to India, by way of San Francisco and Hongkong. Miss Scudder of Scudder missionary fame, who was in France and England, has just returned.

—AT THE OFFICE OF THE Board of the Baptist Missionary Society great alarm is expressed for the Baptists in the European war zone. In countless homes prosperity and contentment have given place to penury and misery. Famine and desolation are following fast. Many ministers and heads of families have been destroyed by war. As yet, it is impossible to estimate the loss because of the cessation of communication to and from all parts of the empire occupied by the Baptists.

THROUGH THE DESERT OF JUDEA

THE STORY OF A PRESENT-DAY TRIP THROUGH THE WILDERNESS OF THE HOLY LAND

BY F. O. BALDWIN



ALONG THE DESERT PATHWAYS

AN OLD CASTLE ON WADY ZUWERA

OUR party of five was anxious to make a trip through the famous wilderness of Judea and on to the ancient fortress of Masada, but we were told that it would never do for us to go unattended.

"When you find yourself surrounded by a band of Bedouins you will feel quite alone," I was assured, and so we secured permission to join a party of fifteen others who were about to make the same tour for scientific research. It was an imposing caravan that left Jerusalem not many months ago, and wound its way slowly down the Kedron Valley towards the wilderness of Judea. We were well mounted on sure-footed Arabian steeds, some looking the worse for wear, yet all traveling splendidly. Our tents and camp equipments were on mules, hardy enduring animals, that carried their heavy burdens over some of the roughest roads with seldom a stumble or fall.

We had our camp go directly to near Tekoa, the birthplace of the prophet Amos, a few miles southeast of Bethlehem. But we took a much longer route, visiting Mar Saba, an old Greek monastery, now used as a sort of prison for unruly monks. After spending an hour or more there, we cut across country to get to our camp. There was no road at all, but we had two Bedouin guides who knew every foot of the desert. They took us down a terribly steep cliff to the bed of the Wady en Nar, which we followed for several miles. We passed two Bedouin camps, one of which had the tents pitched in triangular shape, forming a protection at night for their flocks and camels.

At sundown we were still far from our camp, and in this part of the world there is no twilight. After traveling a long time in silence and darkness, we were gladdened with the sight of our campfires brightly burning.

Early next morning we started for Ain Jidi (Engedi). In this locality Saul fell into David's hands in a cave, and David spared his life. The name "Ain Jidi" means the "spring of the goat," and it is still the haunt of the ibex.

By noon we had left behind us the brilliantly carpeted hills. At this time of the year Palestine abounds with brilliantly colored wild-flowers. Suddenly as we approached the mountain overhanging Engedi, we looked down upon a wonderful contrast to the arid wilderness behind us. There, nearly two thousand feet below, lay the briny waters of the Dead Sea, and fringing its shore was an oasis of exquisite beauty, on a little plain about a mile in width. Here were two abundant springs, giving ample water for the irrigation of small gardens of cucumbers, which the Bedouins raise. To descend this wall of rock was no easy task. We pitched our tents at the upper spring, some seven hundred feet above the Dead Sea. The poor Bedouins in the lower lands get no rest at night owing to mosquitoes, unless they build a bonfire and sleep in the smoke. Here were many large Shittim and "Apple of Sodom" trees. The fruit of the Sodom apple tree is like a large yellow apple in appearance, but on being opened is found to contain only a few soft, silk-like fibers. The Bedouins use this fluff for pillows. To refresh ourselves after the toils of the day we took a swim in the Dead Sea. Unless one takes a fresh water bath after it, a coating of salt is left on the skin, making it very unpleasant.

Next morning at sunrise we proceeded south, following the seashore. For the next two days we did not see a living being nor see a trace of life except an occasional eagle soaring high above us, or at night the camp-fires of Bedouins, some thirty miles away on the highlands of Moab.

A ride of five hours brought us to the foot of Masada, one of the strongest of natural fortress, towering to a height of 1,700 feet above the plain. Its sides are mighty precipices up which no army could climb. On the west it is connected with the plateau by a narrow neck of land, and from this point only could an enemy assail it.

We left our horses at the foot of the mountain and started to climb to the ruins on top of Masada, our guide taking us up the slope of the range to the west across the narrow neck of land. Masada was the last stronghold that held out against the Romans after the fall of Jerusalem, A.D. 79. Thither fled a band of Jews under Eleazar, who believed the Romans could never take it by force. But a wall was built by the Romans at the base of the mountain, entirely closing in the fortress. At different points along it were camps for the soldiers. The outlines of these camps are still plainly seen. The Roman general had the greater portion of the army encamped on the highland to the west of Masada, and set up his battering rams and towers on the narrow connecting neck of land. At this point he made a breach in Herod's wall and set fire to an inner wall of wood and stones, which the Jews had hurriedly built.

We examined carefully the ruins of the old wall, the palace, the citadel and the two columbaria, but were more interested in the huge cisterns for collecting rainwater, and in the large underground vaults where quantities of oil, wine and dates had been stored by Herod. The Jews found that these were still in perfect preservation, although a hundred years had elapsed since they were placed here. The largest cistern we found was about sixty feet underground with steps leading down to it. It was ninety feet long, thirty feet wide and would hold about thirty feet of water. We could see that for many years no water had collected in it, as we found near the bottom the name of Sir Charles Warren written in lead pencil and dated 1875.

Here took place what was probably the most tragical ending to a siege ever recorded in the world's history. After the Romans had succeeded in taking the first wall and had burned the second, they decided to storm the citadel next day. The Jews learned their intention, and to avoid being taken captives they agreed to kill themselves and their wives rather than surrender. They gathered all their valuables in a heap and set them on fire, so that the enemy would find no spoils. Each then ran to his wife and children, and after tenderly embracing them, slew them. Ten men were appointed by lot to kill the others, and after bidding farewell, each man lay down by his loved ones and bared his neck for the blow. After the ten had executed their deadly mission, they again cast lots for one of their number to dispose of them in the same way, which was done, and the last then ran his own sword through his own body. There were in all 960 souls who perished. Two women and five children hid in one of the underground vaults, and when the Romans came next day to assault the place and found no enemy, but a deathlike stillness, they were met by these women with the terrible recital of what had happened.

We have but little history of Masada after this historic siege. The early Christians must have rebuilt it, however, as the remains of a Byzantine church prove.

We left this romantic spot reluctantly and retraced our steps down the steep mountain to the Roman camp, where our horses were waiting. Our camp was to have been pitched in a valley a few miles south of Masada, but we could find no trace of it there. We sent two young men, well mounted, to search. They returned after dark with no news, so we pushed on. We were gladdened at last by seeing the light of a search party from the camp. There was general rejoicing and the firing of guns when they found us, but we were dismayed to learn that there was not a drop of water in sight. Our poor animals had had none during the whole day's march. It was not until noon of the next day when we got to Wady Umm Baghrak that they could quench their thirst. Here was the only living water we struck during the three days' journey south of Engedi.

Our ride during the afternoon was close to the shore of the Dead Sea, and the sulphur springs gave a very obnoxious odor to the atmosphere. We visited Jebel Usdum, a mountain of rock salt seven miles in length; but the heat was so great that we hastened to our camp in Wady Zuwera.

It took two days more of hard traveling to cross the southern portion of the wilderness and get to Hebron. From there another day in the saddle brought us to Jerusalem, our starting-place. We were thankful to get back after a hard but most interesting trip.

A NATIVE CAMP IN THE WILDERNESS OF JUDEA

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Peace Treaties

IT IS a most encouraging sign of the times that the great Powers are willing to sign treaties, which, if faithfully carried out, will practically render war between the signatory Powers impossible. On September 15, while half the world is at war, four such treaties with the United States were signed by the ambassadors respectively of Great Britain, France, Spain and China. Twenty-three nations have now signed similar treaties with the United States, on this country's initiative, agreeing to refer all disputes that are not capable of diplomatic adjustment to one year's investigation by an International Commission, pledging themselves meanwhile to take no overt step, nor even to make preparation for war.

Two-thirds of the world's population are now represented in these similar treaties with the United States, and it seems a reasonable expectation that this sane and safe principle will be adopted between all civilized nations after the present war has ended. Even now, rumors persist of proposals being made to Washington, looking to early mediation in Europe, though thus far they are purely unofficial and tentative.

Let us look forward trusting that the time may be not far distant when all the nations will be enrolled under the banner of peace. In advancing this work, we have found a mission worthy of a great nation.

Why God Permits War

PASTORS who have just returned from Europe bring intelligence of an extraordinary awakening of spiritual interest since the great war opened. Churches are crowded as never before; people of all ranks and conditions fill the sacred edifices; and what seems to be a tidal wave of strong, deep, intense, yet silent feeling is drawing them voluntarily to seek counsel and help from the only Source whence help can come in such a time of tribulation.

God is not the creator of evil. This war of many nations was conceived and begun in the sinful hearts of men, and now it has engulfed more than half the civilized world in a life-and-death struggle. Humanity stands appalled at the result!

Yet, since God has permitted this worst of all wars, there must be behind it some great purpose. Is it that the world might learn, through blood and suffering, just how unspeakably wicked war is? If He makes the "wrath of man to praise him," may not he out of this cyclopean war be teaching us the lesson of world-peace?

Who shall say that it is not his high purpose to make an end of war through this mighty object-lesson which none can misunderstand? Sir Edward Grey is reported to have said that this must be "the last war." In saying this, he had in mind the prohibitive costliness of modern warfare, which brings even the victor nation to the verge of ruin. But the Omnipotent, who rules the destinies of all, is no respecter of men or communities or governments. He who searches the hearts of kings, statesmen and peasants alike, and to whom a nation's treasury is as a penny bank, gives honor and endurance to a nation according to its righteousness alone. Not in greatness, power or wealth, or fleets or armies or far flung conquests, but in humanity, in justice, in integrity, in love for our fellow men of other races, and in our maintenance of peace and friendship with them, are the qualities which he expects and demands of the nations that would enjoy his favor and approval.

Therefore we believe that God, through this war, is teaching the world the blessedness of peace. Not only the combatant nations, but the people of all lands, will have the lesson impressed ineffaceably upon their hearts. Then, instead of sowing war, and reaping the inevitable harvest of death, desolation, sorrow, idleness and poverty, they will plant peace, which will bring security, prosperity, the approval of conscience, the happiness and contentment of mankind and the smile of God.

Turkey and the Missions

THE United States has added its voice to that of the other nations in refusing to acquiesce in the proposal of Turkey that the "extraterritorial" privileges guaranteed to citizens of other nations residing in that country be abrogated. There has been considerable apprehension as to conditions in Turkey for some weeks. Mr. John R. Mott, in a recent conference with President Wilson, seconded the fears expressed recently by Ambassador Morgenthau that a massacre of Christians was not improbable, and that our missions were in grave danger.

Here is another subject for the Christians of America to add to their prayers. Turkey has an opportunity of presenting now to the world a spectacle of the glories of patience and peace, so infinitely greater than the glories of haste and strife.

America wishes Turkey well. Our missionaries there are sent only to bless and help the people of the Ottoman Empire. The old days of the Crusades are dead. Not even to regain the sacred tomb of Christ would we send hostile fleets and armies. But the lives of American citizens must be protected. And the Sultan should consider gravely and long before setting his empire upon a reactionary and bloody course. The prayers of American Christians can reach the palace at Constantinople, and the minds of the Sultan and his advisers can be, by the power of the omnipotent Jehovah, kept in the path of peace.

Your Question

HERE is a question which no one but you can answer. How much will you contribute to the Relief Fund for the widows and orphans of the European war? Even if you have already sent one remittance you still have the question on hand, for the raising of the fund has only begun, and there will be need of far more than as yet has been subscribed. So your question remains—what is to be your part in this great work of love?

Before answering the question will you receive a suggestion? We should like you to do something before making your decision.

If you live in the city, take a stroll through your rooms, noting every dear object that makes Home. Touch the soft ringlets of your little daughter; put your arms around your boy and note how far he has crept on his journey to reach your own height; place your hands upon your wife's shoulders and tell her again that you love her. If you live in the country, walk down to the front gate and look up and down the familiar street; then look back at the house and walk up the path again to the front steps. Don't go in yet; walk around through the side yard toward the back door. It will do no harm to stop at one or two of the bushes or trees on the way and touch some of the dying leaves. Then go into the garden; bend over and smell a cluster of the grapes; notice where the corn grew during the summer; breathe in the atmosphere of that wonderful world—HOME. Go into the house now, and look at each one of the children. Next, take a good long look into your wife's eyes.

Then imagine this: You have looked at these paths and bushes and trees for the last time. You have touched your little boy's forehead, your little girl's hands and lips for the last time. You have looked into your wife's eyes for the last time. In an hour you are to go forth to war and you will never return. Your body will lie in some battlefield trench, your wife a widow, your children fatherless.

You can scarcely dream this dream, but try to do so. Then make yourself realize that in Europe tonight there are hundreds of thousands of homes where these things are literally true—with more than all the despair and anguish that you can possibly dream of.

What are you going to do to help bring back a gleam of cheer to those lonely gardens? What are you going to do to bring back a smile to the frightened faces of those children? What are you going to do to help dry the tears from that wife's cheek, and to ease the agony of her broken heart?

The children have lost their father, the wife her husband. Shall they be forced also to go without food? Shall they be threatened with death, when they have already yielded up their beloved to death?

But not even the beginnings of the story have been told. In countless cases the homes themselves have been destroyed. Where the happy cottage stood in the midst of its little garden is only a pile of ashes, and charred sticks and broken tiles. The children are scattered in strange places, the women huddled and weeping in dumb, bewildered misery. Suppose it were this house of yours that lay behind you in ruins, with none to care for the dear ones, not only fatherless and widowed, but homeless, too?

If this nightmare were true, if it were you who lay dead in the trenches, if it were your home in ruins, would you not like to have the dwellers in a peaceful, happy land beyond the seas rise up and send a shower of gifts across the waves to tide over the cruel winter months until a way can be found for your grief- and fright-crazed family to take up in some way or other the tasks of life again?

The great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will act together in this gift of bounty for broken-hearted Europe. What will be your part? How much do you love your wife and little ones and home? How much would you wish them to have in this time of bitter need if it were they and not these distant friends who were in distress?

Yet, after all, this is not the deepest basis of our decision. How much do you love that Saviour who was the Friend of the hungry, the helpless, the mournful? Remember that he said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me."

Decide now how much you can send these needy friends across the sea. Specify, if you like, in what country you wish it used. It will be forwarded there through the State Department of the United States Government, where it will be directly and skilfully applied. Mail your remittances to "WAR RELIEF FUND," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

The Word of Power

IF words have power, then speak the righteous word,
That may prevail, and over wrong be heard!
A word, God-given, may hush the cruel strife,
And turn the murderous war from death to life!
That word is Peace. It is the word of might,
The word of benediction for the right,
The word by angels loved, by angels taught
When a new Gospel to the earth was brought.

M. D. TOLMAN.

THE most important step in foreign missionary fields is the combining of nearly all the missionary forces to unite in theological education. The Philippines is the latest country to benefit by this. The Ellinwood Bible Seminary, established by the Presbyterian Church at Manila, is to be incorporated into a real Union Theological Seminary in the government of which all the denominations shall have a voice. Ever since the entrance of Protestantism in the Philippines, the denominations have worked in unity. For the past few years the Methodists, by agreement, have had their native pastors trained at Ellinwood. Then the United Brethren in Christ entered into a similar agreement. Now the Baptists and Congregationalists wish to have part in the work, and in consequence there will emerge a new union and a new institution.

Salt Crop Breaks Record

FROM a report of the U. S. Geological Survey, we learn that the production of salt in this country, including Hawaii and Porto Rico, in 1913 reached a total of 34,399,298 barrels of 280 pounds each, or 4,815,902 short tons. The value of the product was a little over ten million dollars. These figures break all the records of the salt industry of the United States as reported by the Government Geological Survey. The figures represent an increase of three per cent. in production, and of eight per cent. in price over the crop of 1912. Salt is secured from two sources: From the rock salt dug out of the earth, and from sea water. Most of the salt in the market is made by converting the rock salt into brine, and then evaporating it. What an important industry the salt production is to man and beast! Salt is a necessary ingredient in the animal system. It renders invaluable service as a preservative against decay. Salt is the symbol of the Christian's life. He is to tone up the moral health of the community, and to use his influence in preventing the moral and spiritual corruptions so natural in the hearts and institutions of society. The loss of this healthful Christian influence is thus deplored:

Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost his savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and be trodden under foot of men. (Matt. 5: 13.)

Snake Bites Warden

A LARGE pilot snake buried its fangs in the hand of Game Warden J. B. Hendershott of Newton, N. J., the other day at Lake Wornock. The warden had struck the snake with a stick and thrown it into the grass, believing it was dead. A few minutes later it revived and stuck its fangs into the man's hand. Mr. Hendershott sucked the poison from the wound, but despite that fact enough of the virus got into his circulation to cause the hand and arm to swell to double their size. He has made a full recovery. There is not a plant or creature, however small or great, or person who does not have some enemy ready to attack or destroy. There are spiritual enemies that beset our pathway, and even make their nests in our souls. The father of all of these forms of moral evil has been pictured as a serpent. The Son of man came to cure the soul of the deadly bite of the serpent sin. When the children of Israel were bitten by the snakes Moses put a brazen serpent on a pole for their healing, a type of Christ crucified, the cure for the soul's deadly bite of sin.

And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass that if the serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived. (Num. 21: 9.)

Mrs. Wilson's Wish Fulfilled

MRS. WOODROW WILSON'S dying wish that Congress abolish the alley slums of the National Capital, was fulfilled on September 14, when the House passed the Senate bill which prohibits the use of dwelling-houses in Washington alleys after four years from the date of the legislation. The bill went to the President for his signature. A few hours before Mrs. Wilson died she said to the physician: "I am going away. I want you to promise me to take good care of Woodrow." Then, addressing her husband, she said: "I could go away happier if I knew the alley slums would be wiped out." The swift passage of this cleaning-up bill was in answer to this dying wish of the President's wife. The nation has cause of congratulation at the moral cleansing of its capital, at the suppression of so many gambling and disorderly houses, and the removal at one stroke by congressional action of one-half of the drinking places of the city. Mrs. Wilson was a real force for righteousness in Washington, and a beautiful moral example to the women of the country. Her personal relation to Christ, so simple and intense, prompted her to activity in all forms of betterment, which reminds us of this description of the personal relationship of the crucified Lord and the loyal woman disciple.

Jesus said unto her, Mary; she turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni, which is to say, Master. (John 20: 16.)

Mussel Yields Costly Pearl

RICHARD THOMAS and August Knies, miners, cast their minnow nets into the Okaw River, just north of Carlyle, Ill., the other day and hauled in a half dozen fresh-water clams. Thomas broke open the shells and was about to toss a mussel into a frying-pan, when his fingers felt a hard substance. "Look here, Gus," he cried, "I believe I have a pearl." His friend looked, and viewed a pearl of rare beauty and value. They made the rounds of the jewelry stores of St. Louis, and were assured that the pearl was genuine, and ought to bring two thousand dollars. In the ordinary transactions of life it often happens that the things we intend to secure have in them so many, many hidden values. The plain discharge of duty in daily toil has in it the most precious pearls. The natives down the banks of the Okaw River will, for a while, be fishing for mussels in hopes of getting a $2,000 pearl, and they will most certainly be disappointed. There is a costly pearl which all can secure without any failure. It is the pearl of infinite love in the crucified Redeemer. It is thus referred to by Christ:

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: who when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had and bought it. (Matt. 13: 45, 46.)

KRUPP GUN FACTORY AT ESSEN

SINCE the world began there have been no such enormous engines of war as those now used. The climax of war enginery in a war-mad age is the gun made at the Krupp factory at Essen, Germany. Not a single fort in Europe, however strongly built, which they have had an opportunity to attack, has been able to withstand the terrific Krupp guns. The work of destruction can be easily done at a range of five miles. The allied forces have said that their revenge will never be complete till the Krupp gun works are totally destroyed. The big guns and armies of millions have not made for peace, as the rulers have claimed, but caused the most gigantic war in human history. But these big guns and armies and battles are to be the death of war, and that suddenly. The millions of the common people of Europe will never go out again to kill and be killed by those against whom they have no grievance, and to satisfy the ambition of their rulers for power, territory or glory. This war is likely to unsteady more than one crown. It is bound to limit monarchy, and give the people their rights. Civilization is not a failure. Christianity is not a failure. Christian rulers have led their nations unwisely and wickedly, but the rank and file of the people of Europe are righteous, peace-loving Christian men, and we believe God will overrule this terrible war for a lasting peace, and the words of the prophet will be fulfilled: "And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Isa. 2: 4.)

Family Prayer Not Obsolete

IN order to ascertain the spiritual condition of the church of today, an experiment was made in three important churches in as many cities of ordinary size. Printed slips with answers to be returned were sent to all the members. Perhaps the most important questions were, "Do you have family prayer?" and "Did your parents maintain a family altar?" There were 12 per cent. more in one church who responded yes to the first question than no. In another church two-thirds of the older ones responding said they were reared in homes where the family altar was maintained, while almost one-half of those under parental control answered that they had family prayers at home now. Another fact brought out by the question was, that 98 per cent. of those responding had had a Christian mother, 90 per cent. a Christian father, and over 63 per cent. had been brought up in homes where there was a family altar. This experiment would indicate the reports from these three churches rebuke the pessimism that is constantly bewailing the loss of personal piety and of family religion in our time, and give encouragement to the belief that the church, despite its faults and sins, was never stronger than it is today in the largeness of its benevolence, in the intensity of its piety, and in the purity and character of its home life. Our religion from primitive times has been a family religion. The Sunday school and young people's societies, important as they are, cannot take the place of the moral and religious atmosphere, teaching and example of the father and the mother. The family is the foundation of the church and the State. The Church of God today can well repeat the words of Joshua:

As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord. (Joshua 24:15.)

National Peace Prayer

PRESIDENT WILSON appointed Sunday, October 4, as a day of prayer for peace in Europe. He did it at the request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, representing thirty denominations and 130,000 churches, and other bodies. Calamities drive individual and nation to the heart of God. It is said that there are three times as many people attending the churches as there were before the war. This is no time for doubt, but for faith. Let the nation with humble but sincere trust take a strong united grip on God for the immediate close of the war, and for the peace of Christ which will make fresh the hearts of nations torn with conflict and bloodshed; that peace of which Christ spoke when he said:

My peace I give unto you. (John 14: 27.)

Wrecked "Karluk's" Survivors Saved

EIGHT whites and one Eskimo family, survivors of the wrecked Canadian ship Karluk, arrived at Nome, Alaska, Sunday, September 13, on the revenue cutter Bear, after being marooned on frozen Wrangell's Island since last January. The rescue was really made by the King and Wing, a gasoline launch. The rescuers were so anxious to find the men that they passed by vast numbers of walruses, within easy reach of guns, much to the sorrow of the natives taken aboard to help in the search. The ship did stop long enough to take a moving picture of a polar bear, which the captain killed with his gun for needed food. Monro, Williamson, McKinley, Chaf, Templeman, Williams, Maurer and an Eskimo family were rescued. Three had died and had been buried under the tent on the island: George S. Malloch, geologist, Bjarne Mamen, assistant topographer, and John Brady, a seaman, who was accidentally shot. The men were taken aboard the King and Wing September 7, and transferred to the Bear September 8. It requires great courage to brave the frozen north in search of its secrets. The shipwreck of Paul, in warmer waters, resulted in no loss of life.

And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land. (Acts 27: 44.)

ATROCITIES IN THE WAR

THE importance given by the warring Powers to the opinions of the American people should make for sober judgment by this nation on all phases of the war, and particularly in regard to the charges and counter-charges that are being made of atrocities perpetrated by the soldiers of the different armies.

Early in the struggle the press printed many harrowing stories of wanton outrage committed in Belgium by German troops. The destruction of peaceful homes, striking down of women and children, burning of villages, was reported as of ordinary occurrence. In due time other stories appeared ascribing to Belgian non-combatants acts of such overt treachery as to merit reprisal by the conquering invaders.

The press of September 9 reported a personal message received by President Wilson from the German Emperor, containing a defense of the destruction of Louvain and other acts committed by German officers in Belgium and France, and expressing, it is claimed, sorrow over unavoidable reprisals. The Kaiser was said to complain in his message that dum-dum bullets were being manufactured and used by the French, who were also violating other rules of war.

On the 11th of September President Poincaré cabled President Wilson denouncing the German Emperor's alleged representations as a "calumny" and "an audacious attempt to reverse rôles." President Poincaré reminded President Wilson that previously on several occasions he had brought to the latter's attention German violations of the rules of war.

On September 16 a special commission sent by King Albert of Belgium to the United States, presented to the President a formal protest against Germany in which it was stated that "Belgian neutrality had been unjustly violated, and since the beginning of hostilities Belgium has been the theater of the worst outrages on the part of the invading German army, in defiance of rules solemnized by international treaty, and consecrated by all nations." "Peaceful inhabitants were massacred, defenseless women and children were outraged, open and undefended towns were destroyed, historic and religious monuments reduced to dust and the famous library of the University of Louvain was given to the flames."

BELGIAN MISSION TO THE PRESIDENT

The representations of such a body are not to be lightly dismissed as the natural exaggerations of impassioned men. But the New York Tribune has this to say editorially on the subject:

> We are bound to say that in itself the evidence of German atrocities against individuals produced by the Belgian commission is far from convincing. There is too much generalization and not enough specific accusation. Terrible as are the specific cases cited, we must even go so far as to say that, accepting them as true, they are scarcely more than the list of outrages which are unavoidable in the wake of a great army overrunning a hostile country. There are hideously vicious individuals in an army, as in a community, and war gives their barbarous instincts full swing.

The President's formal reply to the Germans and French and Belgians furnishes every individual in this country with a safe guide to a mental attitude on the subject of atrocities in the war. He said:

> Presently, I pray God very soon, this war will be over. The day of accounting will then come, when I take it for granted the nations of Europe will assemble to determine a settlement. Where wrongs have been committed their consequences and the relative responsibility involved will be assessed. The nations of the world have fortunately, by agreement, made a plan for such a reckoning and settlement. What such a plan cannot compass the opinion of mankind, the final arbiter of all such matters, will supply. It would be unwise, it would be premature, for a single government, however fortunately separated from the present struggle; it would even be inconsistent to the neutral position of any nation, which like this has no part in the contest, to form or express a final judgment.

The President added that in his opinion "such a reservation of judgment until the end of the war.

THE EVENING BRINGS A' HAME

BY MARY TRAVIS HEWARD

MR. LEGGETT, the rector, had come up the mountain to visit his favorite parishioner, old John Christie, of Christie's Farm. When he stood up to go at six o'clock, old Christie, who could not move, being stretched flat on his back with rheumatism, pulled him by the coat.

"Ye've not told me your trouble yet, Mr. Leggett," said he.

The rector's visits to the farm were scarcely to be classed with his customary parochial calls; they gave him relaxation and refreshment, and anything in the way of counsel or consolation came naturally from the bed-ridden host.

Now he stood still for a minute, with his eyes on the rows of ripening apple trees outside, before replying. The low sun of a late August afternoon parted the boughs with long slanting rays and lay across John's bed.

"No, Mr. Christie," he said, with a certain formality that was habitual with him, "I have not. But it's only this. I heard yesterday from my brother Robert. He wants to come home. He must, in fact. He is an absolute wreck now—his evil courses have had their inevitable effect; and as he can live for himself no longer he comes to me. My house is the only one for him to come to. I am his sole relative."

A certain bitterness made itself felt beneath the rector's low tones.

"When did you see him last?" said Mr. Christie.

"Three years ago," answered Mr. Leggett, with his eyes on the apple trees. "He was fearfully broken then. I saw it was only a question of time how long he could keep it up. He came for money, of course. I have been keeping that man," cried the rector, "for fifteen years, and never a sign of reformation, but always protest promises. He broke my mother's heart and he has done his best to break mine. He wants to come home now because he has got to the end of his rope. If he could have his youth and health once more he would live his life again in the same way!"

"He's your elder brother, isn't he?" said Mr. Christie.

"Yes, he is five years older than I. He was the pride and hope of my mother's heart—much he cared for that! He was always going to do great things, I was the slow one of the family," said the rector, with the same quiet bitterness. "And now he wants to come home."

"It's what my father would have called a sair dispensation," said old Mr. Christie with the little dry chuckle he often used.

"Mr. Christie," cried the rector, wheeling round, "you know it's not that I grudge the cost my brother may be to me! It's the certain conviction I have that he is only turning home now because he is incapable of living his old life any longer—that he is reforming only because he must."

"Oh, ay, I ken that," said Mr. Christie, with a twinkle in his humorous, kind old eyes.

"And there is one other thing," went on Mr. Leggett. "I have been thinking that perhaps my brother's presence in my house may be considered objectionable by the parish. In that case it will, of course, be my duty to resign."

The rector's voice faltered a little here, for he loved his tiny hill-top parish.

"You'll do no such foolish thing," said his host dryly, and the words were balm to Mr. Leggett's weary spirit. "I take it, then, ye've told him to come?"

"Oh, yes," said Mr. Leggett, looking up quickly; "what else could I do?"

"Then that's all right," answered the old man. "When will he get here?"

"He might be here to-morrow—he might possibly be here to-night; he was in the city, he wrote," said the rector.

"Well, Mr. Leggett, my advice is to just take it easy," said the old man, in his dry, common-sense voice that the other found so pleasant.

"Things generally work a way out for themselves if you let 'em. And as for leaving the parish—when we're lucky enough to get a man like you among these mountains, we don't let him go so easily. I think you'll find most all of us will be glad to welcome your brother. After all, it's natural that he should want to come. There's an old Scotch saying that you've may-be heard—'The evening brings a' hame.' It 'ud be strange, wouldn't it, when you come to think of it, if a man didn't want to turn homewards in the evening of his days."

"I had forgot," said the rector in an altered voice. "Robert is an old man now, of course. And he is all broken—I fear he is coming home to die!"

"And speaking of evening," his host continued, not noticing these words, "the sun's sinking now, Mr. Leggett, and the dark'll maybe overtake you on the mountain-side."

"You are right," said the rector slowly. "Good-by, Mr. Christie. Thank you very much for what you have said. I will come to see you soon again, if I may."

"It's a great pleasure and privilege to see you here, Mr. Leggett," said John Christie, with his old-world courtesy. "Take a look at the peach trees as you pass down. They're coming along beautifully, I'm thinking. They're bearing this year for the first time. We've had a lot of trouble with those slips, but they've been well worth it."

"I will," said the rector. "Good-night, Mr. Christie," and he stepped out into the beauty of the evening.

It was like passing through the doors of a cathedral. The sun almost touched the mountain tops, and the long, low beams struck through the translucent air in golden shafts. A wonderful stillness had settled upon everything; not a leaf moved; the trees rose up like pillars; every blade of grass stood distinct and perfect. As so often happens at sunset, the atmosphere became a tangible, visible thing, an embodiment, a realization of light; at a little distance, between the trees, it showed like a golden barrier, and on either hand it rose above the grass like a shining veil.

Seen through this medium, the common things around became clarified and exalted; one seemed to see the spiritual reality of leaf and stick and stone. The tall fragile-looking figure of the rector, with his worn scholar's face and iron-gray hair, stood for a moment transformed in the radiance. Then he turned around the corner of the house and passed down the path by the barn and outbuildings to the farm gate, with his back to the sunset.

On his left hand lay the peach orchard, the heavily laden rows bowed almost to the ground, and below them on the slope the young trees which were bearing this year for the first time. On his right the hens pecked before the open barn door, and within the shadowy embrasure the cows, just driven in, awaited the milkers. The great farm gate stood wide; he passed through it and down a narrow road where the cart-tracks disappeared in the grass. A few yards away the cool, black waters of the creek that ran through the farm lands p ssed beneath a tiny bridge. Mr. Leggett crossed the bridge and set himself to mount the wood-path that led through a tangle of low trees and shrubbery to the mountain road.

It was very still. When once the Christie farm lay behind him, he would see no other human habitation till he reached the tiny group of scattered houses, a mile and a half down the mountain, which he called his parish. But the rector was a lonely soul, and the prospect of a long, slow tramp with no companion but his thoughts was grateful to him. He plunged into the sombre depths of the little wood, and immediately the wonderful world of golden light was left behind. A little faint wind rustled the leaves on all sides, the innumerable leaves, that closed over his head, and fluttered against him, tapping his hands with soft persistent fingers, and tried to bar the way in front of him.

And as he walked he thought of the man who had brought disgrace and shame upon him and who was his brother. There had been no redeeming touch of the romantic or the courageous in that wasted life—nothing but commonplace and sordid sinning. Robert had always been going to do great things, as he had said, but he had accomplished nothing at all—he had even attempted nothing. Mr. Leggett could pretend to have no love for him; he could not even pretend to more pity than one would feel for any crushed and broken thing, an impersonal pity, not unmixed with loathing. His heart was very heavy within him.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

VICTORIES OF PEACE. Members of the cabinet and other notable persons, including the wife of Secretary Bryan, gathered in the office of the Secretary of State on September 15 to witness the signing of treaties between the United States and Great Britain, France, Spain and China. These treaties are similar in their scope to the nineteen already entered into with South American countries and a few others: there are three more to be ratified by the Senate. The significant feature of these treaties is the provision that all disputes which cannot be settled by diplomacy shall be submitted to a commission for investigation for one year. In the opinion of national leaders, this provision practically makes war impossible between the contracting nations. Secretary Bryan, in commenting on the successful conclusion of the year's negotiations, stated that more than 900,000,000 people were represented in the four treaties just signed, and that more than two-thirds of the population of the world are now under similar treaty obligations with the United States.

CLOUDBURST WRECKS TRAIN. A westbound St. Louis and San Francisco passenger train was overthrown by a cloudburst just west of Lebanon, Mo., on September 15, the cars plunging into a flooded gully, about thirty persons being drowned and a score injured. Including the crew there were 100 persons aboard the train. Telegraph and telephone communication had been cut off by the storm, and several hours elapsed before help could be summoned. Passengers aided in the rescues. There were many women and children among the dead and injured.

ARKANSAS LOOKING AHEAD. According to reports, the State of Arkansas at its recent election adopted three constitutional amendments, one of which provides that a child in order to work in a gainful occupation must have attended school four years and be over fourteen years of age. Children under sixteen are barred from hazardous occupations, the State Board of Health determining the presence of hazard. Children under that age may not engage in professional theatrical performances, and are limited to eight hours' work a day; children between sixteen and eighteen are limited to nine hours a day.

OUR FUTURE PRESIDENTS, ETC., ASSEMBLE. The happiest day of the year for the boys and girls has again come round, and school records throughout the country show a largely increased enrolment. Chicago reports about 320,000 pupils, Cook County, outside of Chicago, approximating 50,000. In Philadelphia a half million pupils struggled to be first through the door. Boston schools welcomed about 110,000 overjoyed youngsters. In New York the total ran up to three-quarters of a million, of whom 40,000 must be content as best they can with half-time school work, less than half the number so deprived last year. More than $43,000,000 is asked for by the Greater New York Board of Education for 1915.

ATHLETIC LEADER DIES. The one man to occupy the unique position of national athletic leader, Mr. James E. Sullivan, died September 16, in New York. Mr. Sullivan was a noted authority on amateur athletics and sports, and achieved world-wide prominence. Schoolboys in particular have been inspired to greater and better efforts in physical development by Mr. Sullivan's stimulating example. He was one of the organizers of the Public Schools Athletic League, and a pioneer in playground work. In 1911 Mr. Sullivan received injuries in a train wreck from which he barely recovered, and had several illnesses since. His influence for clean amateur sports has been immense, and constitutes a permanent monument to his worth.

ACCIDENT HELPS IN WIRELESS SITUATION. The great wireless station at Tuckerton, N. J., was partially disabled September 16 by an accident to the machinery, all outgoing service being impossible until repairs are made, which may take several weeks. This trans-Atlantic station was taken over by the government by President Wilson's order September 5, and the increasing complications over the use of the station by the Powers at war in Europe were disposed of by the appointment of United States naval wireless censors, who will have the codes of all foreign governments and will handle no unneutral message and no messages in cipher or code, the key to which they do not possess.

COLORADO'S PEACE HALF WON. Although the mining companies involved in the Colorado coal mine war have not replied to President Wilson's three-year truce proposal, the miners in convention at Trinidad, September 16, voted to accept the proposal which James Lord, president of the mining department of the American Federation of Labor, declared was the greatest opportunity that ever crossed the path of the working class. The United Mine Workers of America two days before had accepted the arrangement in the spirit of compromise, subject to the action of the convention.

HOME RULE TO MARK TIME ONE YEAR. The first decisive result of the European war is a truce between England and Ireland over Home Rule for one year, the measure having been enacted into law with the proviso that its operation should be suspended one year, during which time all parties will concentrate their efforts upon finding a permanent compromise. As a seal of temporary goodwill Premier Asquith will call upon Irishmen to rally to the imperial colors, and John Redmond, the Irish Nationalist leader, will coax them to respond. The House of Commons was packed with spectators to witness the proceedings that resulted in this happy situation, September 15.

A TAX THAT DOESN'T KNOW WHERE TO LIGHT. Congressmen are having difficulty in deciding upon the sources of the $100,000,000 emergency tax which economic prophets are sure will be made necessary by the war's effect upon our customs receipts. The proposed tax on freight bills is abandoned. Other suggestions have been under consideration. Beers and wines and possibly tobacco are still prime favorites of some congressmen—as subjects for special taxation. A stamp tax on bonds and stocks, checks, bills of sale, telegrams and various other evidences of affluence, such as met with so much popularity in the Spanish-American War, is being urged. Opposition to the tax, however assessed, has developed.

HUERTA NOT TO SALUTE THE FLAG. The American army in Vera Cruz has been ordered to return home and bring that flag with them. The patience of the President is at last exhausted, and now, if Huerta decides he wants to salute the Stars and Stripes he will have to hunt it up here in the United States. This action by the President was taken September 15, following an understanding between Washington and General Carranza that the latter will surrender his control of the Mexican provisional government and abide the result of the approaching general election. A provisional president will be chosen meanwhile. Some United States warships will remain in Mexican waters after the departure of our land forces. Dissatisfaction with the withdrawal of American troops at this time has been expressed by representatives of some foreign governments. No further move of importance by the ex-Federals against the Constitutionalists has been reported.

SECTARIAN INSTRUCTION IN SCHOOL HOURS. The experiment, already successfully tried in several countries, of curtailing school hours sufficiently to permit pupils to devote some time each week to the study of religion and morals under teachers of their parents' religious faith, was begun in the Gary, Ind., schools this fall. The Christian Church and the Methodist body are reported as prepared to teach their own creeds as a supplementary course to the public school curriculum, and other denominations are expected to follow. Apparently the sectarian instruction will be given in class-room provided by the several churches outside the schoolhouses. In some places religious teachers have regular hours with their pupils in the schools themselves.

A BUDGET OF EVENTS. Lick observatory reports a new arrival in Jupiter's family of satellites, making a total of nine, the latest so shy that it will probably never be seen except in photographic prints made by long exposures through large telescopes. . . . Venezuela is promised a new revolution by one Alejandro Ducharme. Given arms, ammunition and men, he feels certain of overthrowing Provisional President Bostillos. . . . Confronted by a great amount of detail to be adjusted in order to assure the smooth working of the new banking reserve system, the Federal Reserve Board may be delayed fully two months in announcing the organization of the banks as complete. . . . Philadelphia is bringing to a close the city's most successful outdoor evangelistic campaign conducted by the united churches and religious organizations. . . . David Lubin, director of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome (Italy), urges the Agriculture Committee of the House to introduce here the system of handling farm products used in some European countries, and advocates a national market commission to promote the more economic distribution of farm products throughout the country. . . . Shall dwellers in tenement houses in a city be allowed to raise chickens and incidental disturbances in their back-yards? New York City has settled down to finding out. About 9,000 poultry plants now exist there, 100 of which are in Manhattan, and these represent a total of some 200,000 chickens. The department of health is preparing to evict them all by November 1. The owners are arming and flocking to the colors, calling up the reserves as they gather, viz.: wives and relatives, neighbors who buy eggs, and every one who enjoys a rumpus. . . . From Chicago come reports of a widespread revival of business, thousands of idle men returning to work in various industries.

BRINGING ZION TO AMERICA. The Ninth International Jewish Mission Conference assembled in Hamburg, Germany, the first week of last June. The Continuation Committee of the World's Conference of Foreign Missions sent its secretary. He assured the delegates that when the next World's Conference of Foreign Missions convenes Jewish missions will be found on the program. A resolution was unanimously passed to petition the evangelical churches of Christ in America not to pass by Israel when they plan to evangelize the world. In 1903 there were gathered in Mountain Lake Park a company of Hebrew Christians for conference. The meeting was prophetic of a Hebrew Christian Alliance of America, and eventually of the world. But a prophecy it remained till last winter, when the fifteenth anniversary of the Pittsburg Mission to the Jews was celebrated. There the Alliance again became the subject for discussion and prayer, and on the 22d of May, this year, in the Presbyterian Building, New York, "The Hebrew Christian Alliance of America" was born. Till the general conference, which is to meet in New York during next Easter week, the following officers are elected to serve: President, Rev. S. B. Rohold, Toronto, Canada; vice-president, Dr. H. Zeckhausen, New York; recording secretary, Mr. J. M. Levy, New York; treasurer, Mr. M. Reuben, Pittsburg; corresponding secretary, Rev. A. R. Kuldell, 1618 H. Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

CHICAGO GROWING FROM THE BOTTOM UP. A census of the city of Chicago just completed by the Board of Education, gives the population as 2,437,526, an increase since the Federal census of 1910 of more than a quarter million, considered "normal, progressive and reasonable." There are 50,000 more males than females, and just short of a million minors. It is pointed out that the 212,871 children under four years of age would compose a fairly large city of babies. The foreign element is in the majority in the total population, and the prediction is made that Chicago will become a Teuton-Slav-Scandinavian city. Residents born in foreign countries number 876,288, and the parents of 754,570 are foreign born. The birth-rate is shown to be increasing.

PRACTICAL MISSIONARY ZEAL. Practical co-operation is shown in the plans for the missionary activities of the coming fall and winter. What is called "A United Program of Missionary Study, Prayer, Giving and Service," has been outlined by a committee composed of twenty-eight men and women representing the Foreign Missions Conference, the Home Missions Council, the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions and the Council of Women for Home Missions. Thus all the general and woman's boards of Home and Foreign Missions, with almost no exception, will be united in the scheme this winter. A complete announcement can be secured of the Mission Boards of each denomination or of the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THE MEMORIAL SUPPER

The Lesson in Life

By Amos R. Wells

IN Professor Genung's beautiful story, "The Man with a Pitcher," he imagines a Bethlehem boy, Obed, the son of a shepherd in whose stable Christ was born; moreover, Obed himself was born on the same night. Obed met the wonderful life at points throughout the years, until at length, as a servant in Jerusalem bearing a pitcher of water, he directed the disciples to the upper room of the Last Supper.

Every Christian may be an Obed, the man with a pitcher; that is, may come into vital contact with Jesus Christ as he goes about his ordinary tasks, and may know that he is an essential part of Christ's great work for the salvation of the world. This is one service the Lord's Supper does for all that partake of it sincerely: it brings us so close to Christ in loving communion that henceforth every common act is full of him.

At one time we may be the man with the pitcher, our ordinary secular work being taken up into the great processes of the kingdom of heaven and thereby glorified. At other times we may be the owner of the upper chamber himself, allowed to serve the King more directly and largely.

What are these upper rooms of life? Consider the case of a native chief in Burma who found a leaflet containing the story of what the love of God did for a great sinner. He walked two hundred and fifty miles to find a missionary's wife, who taught him to read the story. The account so impressed him that he came to love God with all his heart, and when he left he took with him a basketful of the same leaflets. Crowds of his father's people came out to hear him when he reached home, and in a single year he led to the true, loving God no fewer than fifteen hundred persons. That first leaflet which the chief's son found cost one cent. Who gave that cent? Whoever it was prepared a glorious upper room in which in a single year fifteen hundred persons held communion with the Son of God.

And now how closely are we pressed against the other thought, the terrible question: "I, who may supply the upper room, may I not on the other hand be the Judas in it?" You will find in the Talmud this searching sentence: "Commit a sin twice, and it will not seem to thee a sin." Judas had so often sinned against Christ's love that such sinning no longer moved his conscience.

The tendency to this sinning is part of the very texture of our lives. It is like the experience of a mother, an artist, whose little child died, and in

THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, October 11, 1914. The Last Supper. Mark 14: 12-26. GOLDEN TEXT: "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death, till he come." 1 Cor. 11: 26. R. V.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

As often as Noah and his children saw the rainbow arch on the flank of the retreating storm, they were reminded of the covenant by which the Almighty had bound himself; and as often as we take our place at the Lord's Supper, we look backwards and forwards. Backwards to the Cross, and onwards to the coming. One end of our rainbow drenches the Cross in its prismatic glory, whilst the other is merged in the radiance of the Advent. The Whole history of the church is embraced between these two termini. By his death her Lover and Bridegroom redeemed her, and by his advent he will take her to himself. We can never forget the Cross, it is the foundation of our hopes; but it is hardly strange, if, just now, we stand often at the oriel window, peering into the Eastern sky to see it irradiated with the first faint flush of the advent-dawn. In the meanwhile, we must needs eat of that bread and drink of that wine; in other words, we must feed our faith, patience, and watchful love by fellowship with him whom, not seeing, we love.

her great loneliness she put upon the canvas all she could remember of the dear face that had disappeared. She succeeded marvelously well, but on taking the picture out one day was horrified to find the face covered with blotches. Carefully she painted over them, but later they reappeared. Then she found that they were due to chemical agents in the very canvas and were unavoidable.

But the blotches may be removed from our lives, so that the fair picture we are seeking to create may remain unmarred in its beauty. This is the blessed meaning of the Lord's Supper. "My body, broken for you; my blood, shed for you"—that is the fountain of love in which the whole fabric of our lives may be washed, and come forth forever clean and pure.

You do not understand? Then read the story of the vicious French boy who was received into the Home for Waifs and Strays at Petitbourg, near Paris. Soon, in a quarrel, he stabbed another boy in the breast. While the wounded boy was languishing in the hospital, according to custom the inmates voted on the sentence, which they made expulsion. The director opposed this, since it would fix the boy in evil, and the boys changed it to indefinite imprisonment. As usual, the director asked whether any boy would take the culprit's place. No one responded, and he was imprisoned. Some time later the director reminded the boys of the case and again asked, "Who will take his place?" "I will," was promptly answered, and to the amazement of all, still pale and feeble, the injured boy came forward, just discharged from the hospital. The generous lad was imprisoned, and the vicious youth was compelled to carry food to him three times a day. His heart was touched, his life was changed, and he entered upon his regeneration. In that wounded boy was the spirit of Christ.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

BETWEEN the First Passover and the Last Supper lie more than twelve centuries. Nineteen Christian centuries add another unbroken series of chapters concerning the meaning and value of a truth and an event than which there is no greater in human history—"without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin" and the sacrificial death of Christ. Four systems of ritual still embody this truth and point to the supreme event. The simple ritual of the Lord's Supper in the Reformed churches reaches back for centuries. The more elaborate ritual of the Roman Catholic service of the Mass dates back from the Middle Ages. Both look back to the sacrificial death of Christ.

Two other rituals, the Jewish and the Samaritan, still exist, whose origin is connected with the fundamental truths of our own: The Jewish, which accepts the entire Old Testament and celebrates the Passover in the modified Jewish form without the bloody sacrifice, and the Samaritan, which accepts only the Four Books of Moses and still offers on Mount Gerizim a bloody sacrifice, and is the last vestige of the earliest Jewish ritual.

The Samaritan Passover, celebrated at the same time as the Jewish, at the full moon of the month of Nisan, fell this year on Thursday, the 9th of April, or, adopting their dates, began at the sunset of that day, Friday, the 10th of April. It was my great privilege to be one of a number of invited guests at the celebration of this (1914) Passover.

We ascended Gerizim during the afternoon and were met and welcomed by all that now remains of the Samaritan people. Half an hour before sunset the community began chanting the portions of the Pentateuch (Ex. 12) used in connection with the Passover. Exactly at sunset the lambs were slain. The chanting, led by the high priest, became fierce in its frenzy. Two hours later the sacrifice was ready for the pot and fire. At midnight the steaming pit was opened. The roasted sacrifice was hoisted aloft and borne quickly to the lines of worshipers, who ate "in haste," "loins girded," "shoes on their feet," "staves in their hands," with noise and commotion, till not a morsel remained. A bonfire consumed all that remained of wood and bones and other traces of the sacrifice, in literal fulfilment of the directions of Moses in Exodus 12: 2-11.

All four rituals, to the thinking mind, bear witness to Christ's words —"the flesh profiteth nothing," but his words translated into character and action—they are spirit and they are life.

Jesus and His Guests

By Arthur H. Howland

IT attracted little attention in Jerusalem when the Carpenter and his twelve friends made their way into the upper room and ate together their simple passover meal. But that supper has outgrown in interest and influence the great institution of the Passover itself.

It is pleasant to think how Peter and John, Andrew and James, Philip and the rest went up the stairs, removed their sandals and cloaks, and gathered around the simple table with their wonderful Friend. There was mingled gladness and sorrow during the meal. We can imagine the quiet talking, the good comradeship, the strange foreboding that desperate trouble for their Leader was just ahead, the strange emotion that filled them at the announcement that one of them should betray their Master to his enemies.

He called the bread his body and the wine his blood, the body that was to be broken and the blood that was to be shed in order that they and we and all the world might be made good. During the lessons to follow this we shall study about the death of Jesus, but we will remember through it all, what was the purpose of his death. It has never been better put than in that sweet, sad hymn about "The Green Hill Far Away":

He died to make us good.

This is what it was for—to make us good. There has been much discussion about the Lord's Supper—its form and other matters concerning it. But whatever we may not understand, or whatever we may forget, we can remember this—that he died to make us good.

Are we disappointing him? When we take part in the supper which commemorates that supper of long ago do we really feel his presence coming to us, and his power making us strong to do right? Not only at the communion table, but always, we need and may have his healing, strengthening presence.

Whenever we eat and drink we should remember Jesus, and praise him for giving his body to be broken and his blood to be shed for us. He will be our abiding guest. He has said: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock. If any man hear my voice, and open unto me, I will come in unto him, and sup with him, and he with me." (Rev. 3: 20.)

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by FRANK L. BROWN, General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

WHAT suggestions would you make for interesting a class of boys about seven years of age?

To meet the problem of holding some of the boys of the Sunday school in doing the greatest service possible for the boys, the home, the church and the community.

I suppose the whole thing is settled in a large degree if boys in our care would all feel cordial love. The church is responsible, and is called the "Bride" and [illegible] to begin early. Does some one think it a question of the teacher's house? But that is only the smaller meeting. Every night in the week the teacher's house is open for the boys who can drop in, play games and have some "eats" [illegible] mother is [illegible] to provide lunch.

The best part of it is a Class every day in the week as every class does. Out of this every pledge to the Master served the good and service out [illegible] for the class [illegible] home.

The class has recently been given a class-room. This room they have made a class home. The walls they have decorated with pictures, pennants and mottoes. Perhaps a review of these will give the secret of the class interest and atmosphere.

There are three leather shields on which there are three strong sentiments painted in color against the brown background. They are 1. Psa. Purity, Activity, Sincerity. 2. Joshua 24: 15. "Choose you this day whom ye will serve." 3. I Cor. 16: 13. "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."

Another pennant bears the significant text: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Another, "Pals' Bible Class. Life worth while."

Some good cut mottoes read: "Be happy. Real happiness is found by passing a little happiness around."

The thing that goes the farthest
Toward making life worth while,
That costs the least and does the most,
Is just a pleasant smile.

Smile and the world smiles with you,
Kick and you kick alone,
For the cheerful grin will let you in
Where the knocker is never known.

It's easy enough to be pleasant
When life flows along like a song,
But the man with a smile
Is the man worth while
When everything goes dead wrong.

There is a blackboard in the room for announcements and lesson use. The certificate of class organization obtained from the State Sunday School Association is framed and on the wall.

Other pictures are those of Christ, and of George Washington praying at Valley Forge. The window sill is framed in the class colors, blue and white. Our blue and white pennants decorate most of the balance of the available space.

The result is a class interest and attendance winter and summer that is rare. The class is the most prompt in the department as to attendance. There is, of course, a devoted teacher, Mr. Herman Kraft, back of it all. He interests himself in the purity life of the young men by suggesting wholesome books, and he is a comrade to the boys.

You can't make bricks without straw. And you can't hold boys at this difficult period without heart and hand working together.

This class of boys plans to take up in the fall the Sunday school leadership training course appearing in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Address questions to Frank L. Brown, care of CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

THE members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League have not only a special interest, but a special responsibility in observing Sunday, October 4, as the National Day of Prayer for Peace proclaimed by President Wilson. As already announced, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was one of the organizations urging the President to make this proclamation. Ever since the war began letters from members of the Prayer League were received asking that prayers be made for peace. One of the earliest of these came from the beloved "Mother" of the Prayer League, Mrs. J. A. Hardy, of Portsmouth, Va. A number wrote suggesting that the President be urged to appoint this day of prayer for peace, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD telegram to the President carried forward these requests. A few days after this the proclamation was made. The members of the Prayer League are grateful to have had a part in so great an event.

Special services will be held at the Bowery Mission on the day appointed by the President. The tie between the Bowery Mission and the Prayer League is particularly close, since it is there that the requests sent to the Prayer League office are made the special subject of definite, audible petition. So on this great national Peace Prayer Day the members of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Prayer League will be knit together more closely than ever before, as they engage in earnest intercession that the havoc and anguish of the war in Europe may come to a speedy end. All Prayer League members are urged to arrange for and to promote prayer gatherings for peace on that day, and to co-operate to the fullest possible extent with whatever local arrangements have already been made.

From Jacksonville, Fla., J. M. writes: "I requested prayers for my mother, and her health is now improving every day." Mrs. C. H. G., of Spruce Bluff, Sask., writes: "God has most graciously answered our prayers and raised me from a bed of sickness, and also blesses me daily in spiritual as well as material things." Mrs. E. B. writes from Athens, Pa.: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayer. I wrote about three months ago, asking that prayer be made for me that I might regain my health and that a burden might be lifted. Now I can say 'Praise the Lord!' for I know he has heard and answered. I am greatly improved in health. It is one of the greatest comforts of my life to know I belong to this Prayer League. I find so much true comfort and happiness at each noon hour."

Not only in America and Canada, but in other countries, are the prayers of our League being answered. J. Von B. writes from Rotterdam, Holland: "Now the Lord has heard the prayers sent up to him by myself and others. The Prayer League has done its part. May it bring me still nearer to him!" From the aged, as well as from the young and those in middle life, come acknowledgments of God's goodness in answer to prayer. Mrs. E. U. writes from Dimondale, N. Y.: "My prayers have been answered many times. As I look back over my past life of nearly eighty years, I realize how our heavenly Father has watched over me and kept me. I believe in answers to prayer."

10% More for Your Money

Quaker Oats is put up also in a 25-cent size, nearly three times as large as the 10-cent size. By saving in packing it offers you 10 per cent more for your money. See how long it lasts.

Not for Children Only

Quaker Oats is not for children only.
They should not monopolize vim.

Countless men and women—tired, languid, lagging—need the energy in Quaker. A big dish daily for a month might change life's whole complexion.

For Quaker has no rival as a vim-producing food. It is the finest form of the spirit-giving grain. Scientists say that a single dish supplies a half-day's energy.

You know what it does for children. But others need vitality—need phosphorus and lecithin. And there's a wealth of both in Quaker.

But don't serve little dishes. Where it's needed, serve it in abundance.

Quaker Oats

The Luscious Queen-Grains Flaked

You get in Quaker just the queen-grains—just the choicest one-third of choice oats. All puny grains are discarded.

You see the result in the big, white flakes. You taste it in the luscious flavor.

In getting this quality, a bushel of choice oats yields but ten pounds of Quaker. But that cream of the grain costs you no extra price. Simply say "Quaker Oats" and you get it—for one-half cent per dish.

It is well worth while. It makes folks delight in Quaker. They never grow tired of it, and they eat enough.

From all over the world people send here for Quaker—just to get this matchless flavor. Here, where every store supplies it, you should get it always.

Quaker Cooker

We have made to our order—from pure Aluminum—a perfect Double Boiler. It is extra large and heavy. We supply it to users of Quaker Oats for cooking these flakes in the ideal way. It insures the fullness of food value and flavor. See our offer in each package.

LIFE'S SIGNBOARDS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

COMING out from the city on the fast trains I pass many familiar landmarks. First come the meadows (a dreary stretch of sun-burned marshland), then two bridges, and then a large, imposing station followed by smaller ones in rapid succession. If I am tired, I think as I pass each well-known place, "I am coming nearer home." But if I am happy and rested and open to interest, I feel glad to see each one of them. Life, girls, is not unlike that, for each stage of our journey is marked out by a sign to pass, or a bridge to cross, or maybe a station to stop at.

Shakespeare divides a man's life into seven ages: the baby, schoolboy, lover, soldier, judge, old age, and second childhood. A man's life, however (and a woman's, too), is divided by many more than seven.

Just as there are different landmarks on every road, there are different turnings in the paths of life. Some people have thousands of "ages" and some have one or two—no more.

I once knew a woman, a little, fluttery, doll-like woman, who had never seemed to outgrow her schoolgirl giggle and childish thoughts. She lived in a world made bright with many rainbows, and smiled as sorrow passed her by. The things that seemed very serious and important to us, she treated as a huge joke; and the things that brought very real tears to our eyes, did not ruffle her wonderful calm.

One day the Sorrow that had always walked by on the other side of the street tapped at the little lady's door. It was a merry child with gray hair and dancing feet that tripped to meet him; but it was a broken, worn-out woman who crept away from the sight of his face. She had passed from the fairy-tale land of springtime into the grim cold of mid-winter without having seen a single milepost on the way.

The heart of a child is a thing to be kept always, I think, but folk sometimes go to extremes, and oh! how much they miss!

There are other people who meet old age at the very gateway, before he has decided to come in, and they, too, miss a great deal that is sweet and good and tender. I have seen college girls, and young business men, with lines about the eyes and mouths that have made their faces pitiful and middle-aged; I have seen women who have spoiled six of the seven ages that Shakespeare speaks of (and a hundred that he does not speak of) by the ceaseless grind and wear and tear of their troubled minds. I have looked around me at the gay places of the city and seen faces made blasé and weary by too much of life's sweetness.

I do not think there are two people in the country who have passed through the same stages in life in the same way. I know that I graduated from babyhood when I was led to church with my first wide hair ribbon and a pocketful of round peppermint candies to keep me quiet. My first report card in school and my first promotion brought similar thrills, and I think I began to feel grown up when I wore my first shiny black silk stockings. Chemistry lessons brought another change, and so did leaving school, and my first published poem. And there were other things, too, trifling, or too terribly important to talk about.

My mother tells about her first dress with a pocket in it, and says that she will always remember the feelings she had when she wore it for the first time; and I have heard my father speak of the long trousers that made him grow up suddenly from a whistling, mischievous boy to a man of affairs.

On the road of life the signboards fly by with amazing rapidity, marking off the stages of our long journey that seems at times only too short. There is a bridge, indicating some grave decision, to be crossed, and a dangerous trestle that must be passed over at the risk of happiness, or perhaps even life. There are stations that we pause at, to rest, or to stay for we know not how long, and there are long waits that are tiresome and lonely.

But if we are happy, if we are interested in the country that we fly through, we smile as we pass the landmarks and say: "Now I am nearer home."

THE PRAYER THAT PREVAILS

HOW shall we pray the prayer that prevails? If we could answer this question, life would look very different to us: most of our troubles would vanish away. Let us try to gain from the teachings of Him whose prayers did prevail, something of the great art, if we may call it so. If his disciples long ago could master it so that their prayers prevailed, then we also can learn it.

First among the teachings of the Master on this subject, we find the passage beginning: "Ask and ye shall receive," and as given in Matt. 7, we read that the Father is as ready to give "good things" to his children as we are to ours. So we are to ask for whatever we want, that is plain, whether it is for the needs of our souls or our bodies. Yet we are all perplexed because we have asked for things which we have not received. Why is this? Perhaps there is something to learn about the manner of asking. From the parable of the publican and sinner we learn that one should go where he is unseen of men, alone with his God; where his mind is not distracted by outside things, so that the sense of closeness to the Father waxes strong within him. Christ felt this need and often, we read, went to the mountain-top to pray. From the story of the importunate widow we discover that there is as much need of persistence in prayer as in any other department of life. "And all things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."

When we pray, let us always say as did Christ at the tomb of Lazarus, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me, and I know that thou hearest me always." And at the close of our prayer give thanks again that we have received in full measure that for which we have asked. This and this only is faith. Without faith enough to give thanks to God who hears and answers all believers, our prayers will not avail.

Perhaps we shall not at once see with our mortal eyes the answer to our prayer; nevertheless it is there, and if our belief were of the apostolic kind, we would see it. Then we must continue to pray, to give thanks for the answer, stop worrying about it! Practically speaking, here is the root of the trouble with us. We will not trust, after we have prayed, and God cannot and will not answer the prayers of anxious and worrying Christians.

"Son, all that I have is thine," says the Father to the elder son who has never wandered—and as such we have a right to ask our own. Don't you know how proud a father is when his children look him in the face and demand the very best he has to give? He is proud to be commanded of them: he loves to serve them. Don't you think God loves to serve us, too, and is pleased when we ask that his kingdom may come on earth, and his will be done?

that I most frequently use. When things get scratched or dulled, I get out my little cans of Acme Quality finishes and freshen up. Acme Quality Varnotile (Floor Varnish) keeps my floors beautiful. They dry quickly and are kept clean almost without work. My baseboards never look mussy; it's too easy to brighten them up to let them go when marred. A coat of Acme Quality Linoleum Varnish keeps my kitchen floor as shiny as new.

"How did I learn to do it? The Acme Quality books—'Acme Quality Painting Guide' and 'Home Decorating'—tell you just what finish to buy for each different surface and just how it should be used, what brushes you need and everything. THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Next Steps*

FAITH, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly-kindness, love! Whatever figure of speech one uses, these are beautiful steps. They make fine steps forward as on a journey; they make fine steps upward as on a stairway; they make fine stones for building a beautiful monument. Those of us who are familiar with the Authorized Version in which the exhortation is given that we should add each of these beautiful things to the thing before will be surprised to notice the reading in the Revised Versions. They read: "In your faith, supply virtue; in your virtue, knowledge; in your knowledge, temperance," etc. The idea of the Greek word is that each successive thing is not merely added to what comes before, but grows out of it. If we have the right kind of faith, out of that faith will spring virtue. And virtue here is not quite what we mean by our word virtue. It has the idea of efficiency, courage, strength. High school students have found in their Latin work that an excellent way to translate that familiar word "virtus" is valor, and the Greek word is about the same. Our faith is to make us strong and brave to do right. Now, out of this valorous faith will grow knowledge. Our faith and courage will give us an insight into spiritual and moral matters so that we shall believe and act wisely. Next will come temperance, which means self-control, or balance. Many people whose faith and courage are fine and whose knowledge is accurate become either unbalanced by enthusiasm or overthrown by sudden temptations. The old words hold true: "He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city." Next comes patience. The word here means more than patience. It is patience with the quality of vigorous endurance or perseverance. It does not only mean bearing of trials and waiting for victory, but a manly, courageous kind of patience that endures hardness "as a good soldier." It may seem strange to say that out of all these things will grow godliness and piety. We have supposed that these things grow out of piety. Both are true. We must have piety for the first step and at every step, but as we take these other steps our piety will increase. When we remember that piety means loving God and staying near God and becoming like God we shall understand that this is true. As we "exercise ourselves unto godliness" (I Tim. 4: 7) our godliness, or godlikeness, increases. Out of such godliness as this will grow brotherly love, that unique Christian grace. And along with brotherly love shall grow that still deeper and greater grace, love, a deep heart experience which includes love for Christ, love for our companions in Christ's service, love for our neighbors and associates everywhere, love for the sinful, the love that desires to win them to Jesus; love for all the world, the last nation, the last unblessed man or woman or little child in the most distant land.

But now about our society. What is our next step? We should try to find individually just how far we have progressed in our growth in grace and then strive together to bring our society up to a higher spiritual plane than it has yet reached and to greater accomplishments than it has yet achieved. Young people's societies have been adopting the "efficiency" idea so popular now in offices and factories. We must be careful in trying to apply efficiency methods to our society work not to become mechanical, not to rely too much on human endeavor and human skill and human planning. This progress in grace Peter thought of throughout as a progress wrought by divine power. Paul exhorted us to work faithfully and vigilantly because God is working in us "to will and to do of his good pleasure." (Phil. 2: 13.) We must remember with every step that it is not by might, nor by power from any human source, but by God's Spirit that results are won for eternity.

Look over your local situation. See what needs to be done. See how well equipped you are for the tasks at hand. Then ask for the specific grace you need, whether for evangelistic endeavor, or welfare work, or more strenuous Bible study, or new plans for prayer, or new zeal in missions. Then, "whatsoever he saith unto you, do it," and "whatsoever thine hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

* "NEXT STEPS FOR OUR SOCIETY." II Peter 1: 1-18. B. Y. P. U. and Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, October 11, 1914.

Christian Stewardship*

ECONOMISTS have analyzed and pondered that strange and beautiful picture from the book of Acts (chapter 4: 34-37) in which "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul. Neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." Some have believed that this was meant to be the permanent plan for Christian living, carrying out the economic theory of communism; others hold that this was a temporary plan for taking care of the great multitudes of Christian believers who found themselves in Jerusalem without sufficient funds to provide for their prolonged stay.

But in either case the incident shows the true inwardness of Christianity, giving up things for others, sharing with others in the name of Christ.

In our other reference, I Cor. 16: 1, 2, Paul states the right plan for Christian giving. "Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God has prospered him." Systematic, voluntary, generous giving—that is the program.

It is difficult to say what was in the Lesson Committee's mind in announcing the title "The Christian Suggestion of Profit-Sharing." Whether it was to relate to industrial affairs or ecclesiastical we are not sure. But it would be difficult to pass this subject of profit-sharing by without referring to the just and excellent plan which many industrial concerns have adopted, of sharing the profits of their business with their employees. The most notable case of this plan on record is that of Henry A. Ford, who recently startled the world by declaring he would give back to his employees half the net earnings of the business for the year. Twelve million dollars were in this way returned to those who had done the work of the factories.

There can be no doubt that matters are progressing steadily in the direction of a more just balance between the income of the worker and that of the business planner, while the luxurious living of the altogether idle rich, who reap the products of toil with no toil whatever, is a thing that will not much longer be tolerated. Whatever the Old World may do with its industrial and economic problems, there is no excuse in America for multitudes of unemployed, multitudes of paupers, other multitudes of distressingly poor, and large numbers of idle and extravagant consumers of wealth which has been produced by the toil of others. Whatever may be the final adjustment, profit-sharing is a step in the right direction, and a step which has the sanction of Christianity, since it comes out of the Christian spirit.

SHOULD A GIRL CHOOSE A VOCATION?

BY LUCY RIDER MEYER

"WHICH would you rather do, Alice?"—I asked the question of a seventeen-year-old girl who had just graduated from the high school—"go to normal school or college and become a teacher and earn a good salary, or marry and settle down in some little home, perhaps never to be heard of again?"

A deep flush dyed the girl's cheeks. But it was a moment of rare confidences. She looked up, frankness struggling with suddenly shyness in her face, and replied bravely,

"Shall I tell you the truth, Auntie? I had rather marry a good man and have a little home of my own than anything else in the world."

Alice had blushed, but there was nothing to be ashamed of in her confession. Few girls are as frank, but all normal girls share the feelings she avowed. The attraction of young men and women for each other, the desire of a girl for a husband—"some good man"—and a home; yes, and for children, too, is as natural as breathing. The homes of our country are based upon this instinct, and the country itself is based upon its homes. Most girls will marry. There are exceptions divinely ordained exceptions. We may speak of them in a later article. But most girls naturally and happily go into the little domestic circle.

This being so, does not the question answer itself? For, why should a young woman choose a vocation and laboriously prepare for it when there is so great a probability that she will never enter it, or that she will remain in it only a very short time?

"But, Auntie," went on Alice—to recur to the conversation—"I think I'd like to go to college, just the same."

"But why," I urged, surprised, "since you so decidedly prefer the other life? You won't need the binomial theorem to make bread by?"

Alice was not shaken a particle, only a little confused. But she knew her own mind and as we talked on her reasons came out clearly. In the first place, she averred with her head in the air that she wanted just as good an education as any man who might ask her to marry him. Moreover, she wanted to be independent—to be able to earn her own living whether or not there should ever be the need. Then, while the binomial theorem might not directly help in bread making, yet the mental discipline gained in the study of that theorem—and the thousand things that go with it in a liberal education—would help her make bread, would help her to live her life worthily and with dignity and poise. Moreover, she wanted to learn about things in this great wonderful world, to know a great deal more about matters of which she had as yet caught only glimpses. She was eager to study. In college life, too, she believed she would meet no end of "nice folks." Last of all—and this with the rich color again flooding her face—suppose she didn't go to college but just waited? It was very possible that the right man might not come along at all. At any rate, she wasn't going to just sit down and wait for him.

Complications in the Way

Wise little Alice! She answered the question of our title in the affirmative. And she was right. In these days of modern life, complicated as never before and laden with opportunity for young women as well as young men as never before, it is well for every young woman who can possibly do so to plan some distinct profession or occupation for her life and to carefully prepare for it. It will be easy to change plans, oh, wonderfully easy—when Prince Charming comes along. Besides—Alice didn't say this, but it's true—Prince Charming will be more likely to pause by the side of an earnest girl, busy at making her life count for as much as possible in the world, than at the side of the girl who is "just waiting."

Not all young women find themselves so situated that it is possible for them to command their own life. Many are tied down, some with bonds irksome—lack of health or means, or some grinding inability—and others with blessed bonds of responsibility in the dear home, most joyfully borne. Before the loyal feet of many, the great, good Master of Destiny has marked out a path so plain that it would be sheer rebellion to try to do otherwise than to unquestionably walk in it. And always and always, above all our human plannings, the Christian girl must remember that the very best thing in life, after all, is not, in itself, college or profession or riches or fame—it is to walk sweetly and humbly in the path that the Father marks out for each one of his children. If that path lies toward college and its opportunities we will thank him; if it lies along some narrower and rougher valley, we will still—thank him!

The Case of the "Average Girl"

But the average free American girl, the girl whose father is able and willing to "help her through school," or the one who is strong and resourceful enough to "work her way through," should aim at an education as broad and comprehensive as possible. Moreover, while the foundations of her intellectual life should be thus laid broad and deep, she should not be content with generalities. She will be wise if she "specializes," as Alice put it—makes her study so tend in one direction that at the end she shall know one thing and know it so well that at a moment's notice she can "mobilize" her forces, to use a word growing dreadfully familiar to us. To be ready to seize an opportunity—how vastly important this is! If Florence Nightingale had not painstakingly studied nursing in every way known to her, including a practical course with the deaconesses at Kaiserswerth in which she actually cared for the sick with her own delicate hands, she would not have been ready for her great work among the wounded soldiers of the Crimean War; and she would not have become the forerunner and inspiration of the great army of trained nurses who to-day are doing much for the comfort of mankind and the advancement of medical science. If Frances Willard had not been thoroughly ready, drilled in literature and public speaking and saturated with the spirit of Christian service, she never could have taken the place she did as Queen of the White Ribbon Army when the Ohio Temperance Crusade awakened the Christian world to the possibilities of woman's work in temperance. Such great openings as these come to very few, of course, but be the critical moment of a life fraught with things small or great, every right minded girl must feel her heart swell with the resolve—"I will be ready!"

The Lure of Large Possibilities

It bears very directly on the question, also, that every bit of effort to prepare oneself for the largest possibilities that can come to one brings with it its own immediate reward in expansion of one's moral and intellectual life. The well-educated woman, whether she be doing housework or editing a paper, is likely to have more wideness of vision and to get more out of life than her less thoroughly trained sister.

There are many professions and industrial occupations open to women, more than a hundred, experts say. Very many of these, be it said for the comfort of those who are providentially debarred from a college education, are quite open to the high school graduate—of course with the additional technical training required in each case. Many young women will still choose teaching, will almost drift into it by the traditions of the past, when it was almost the only profession open to women, and because of the fitness of things; for woman is the natural director of children. And for the young woman who hasn't a distinct liking for children there are many forms of teaching adults. A friend of mine is taking a thorough course in domestic economy, paying particular attention to dietetics—food constitution, combinations, values, preparations, etc. She is preparing herself possibly for housekeeping, not the haphazard mixing things together "just so they taste good" that so largely obtains now, but thoroughly scientific housekeeping. Or she may become the dietitian of some great hospital, teaching the nurses how to prepare food for the sick, as well as ordering the dietary of all in the house. Or she may become a visitor among the poor in some great city teaching mothers in poor homes how to prepare and purchase food. Then the attractive work of the stenographer and the trained nurse is too well known to require mention; and there are some women who are so naturally the leaders of others that with only the practical preparation that apprenticeship gives, they find important industrial positions as heads of departments in factories and shops. A great responsibility this, and a great opportunity; for with the oversight of the work of these large groups of girls an earnest Christian will find much opportunity for social and religious guidance. Social service, occupying one's entire time, is becoming a very attractive calling; and the deaconess work and the mission fields at home and abroad are pleading for recruits. Many girls feel vaguely that religious or social work is, after all, what they most desire to do.

Why not, in this case, go to one of the excellent training schools that have been established, many of which receive cordially any girl who wants to study the Bible and see more of mission and social needs and the efforts to meet them? In this way a young woman gives herself a fair chance to find out the will of the Lord concerning her. And it is to be noted that the Bible study in these schools and the work done in the mission and social service problems of the great city cannot fail to be in themselves immensely valuable, whatever one's final decision may be. For the woman who is not in robust health there is horticulture and market gardening and even general farming. A friend of mine, quite broken nervously in arduous deaconess work, has quite regained her health, though she is not young, in managing a small farm; and has besides fallen violently in love with her new profession.

Can I help any girl reader in planning her life? Or in enlarging its scope if it is molding itself in too narrow lines? Write me frankly and be sure of personal attention to every letter. 4949 Indiana Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Mountain Lake Conference

THE first Interdenominational and International Bible Conference was held recently at Mountain Lake Park, Md., the home of camp-meetings and Chautauquas for the past thirty-two years. The teaching of positive truth and the illumination of the deep things of God was pre-eminently the business of the Bible Conference. Chief among the speakers were Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, England, and the Rev. John McNeill, of Toronto, Canada. Drs. Gray, Biederwolf, Meyer and McNeill contributed to the success of the conference. Among the other speakers were Rev. Elijah P. Brown, Rev. Milford H. Lyon, Rev. Percival Campbell Morgan (son of Dr. G. Campbell Morgan of London, England), Rev. Charles Scanlon, and Rev. H. M. Hamill. E. O. Excell, of Chicago, led the congregational singing. Dr. Hamill, the president of the International Sunday School Association, was the special speaker on Sunday School Day. It is hoped to make Mountain Lake Park a center for one of the great Bible conferences of the country, like Northfield, Mass., and Winona Lake, Ind.

MAKE YOUR OWN POLISH MOP

Any mop will do—even a common kitchen mop that you can buy at any store. First, cut it off about four inches from the handle. It works best that way. Then moisten with cold water and pour on a little 3-in-One so that mop is permeated with the oil. Then go over floor (hardwood, painted or linoleum) and note the surprising result. Your mop has picked up all dust and lint. The floor finish is beautifully livened and renewed. Also, you're not tired, as you would have been, had you polished on hands and knees. Try this easy, economical way today.

3-in-One is sold in hardware, drug, grocery, housefurnishing and general stores: 1 oz., 10c; 3 oz., 25c; 8 oz. (½ pt.) 50c. Also in patent Handy Oil Cans, 3½ oz., 25c. If your dealer hasn't these cans, we will send one by parcel post, full of 3-in-One, for 30c.

of many places which had before passed into the possession of the Germans, such as Amiens, Vitry, Château Thierry, Rheims, Châlons, etc. Some of these were recaptured and others were abandoned by the retreating invaders. The Germans also lost prisoners, cannon and munitions of war during the retreat. The most important result of the German retreat in a military sense is, that it has restored to a large degree the confidence of the French troops in themselves, a very important factor in their future success.

Though the tide of invasion has rolled away from Paris, there has been no relaxation there in putting the city into as perfect a state of defense as possible, nor has there been any serious talk of bringing the government back to that city from its temporary seat at Bordeaux; nor probably will this be done unless the Germans are defeated in a decisive battle.

When the Germans, about the 15th of the month, reached the present line of battle, their retreat halted and the armies began preparations for a permanent stand. Entrenchments and other earthwork fortifications were made, artillery brought up and put into position, lines of communication with the bases of supplies established or strengthened, ammunition and supplies, of both of which those on the battle line stood in need, brought up, and most important of all, large reinforcements of fresh or nearly fresh troops brought up from Germany and Belgium. During this time, also, the weary retreating troops had some chance, though more or less harried by the Allies, to secure some rest.

At the present time (September 19) the Germans are in a force of about 900,000, in a well chosen position both for offense and defense, giving battle to the entire army of the Allies.

Little has come over the cables concerning this battle or its results. From this little, however, it is clear that it is easily the most important both in numbers and in its effects on the future course of the war which has yet been fought. It will probably be to a large degree decisive of this phase of the war. If the Allies win, it will mean that the Germans will have to fall back on their first line of defenses on German soil, and the Allies will be forced into assuming the offensive in the enemy's country.

If, on the other hand, the Germans win, the victory will enable them to again assume the offensive in France, with all its possible disastrous consequences to the Allies.

There has been some desultory skirmishing in Belgium during the week, but nothing warranting an extended mention. Reports have been current of the abandonment of Liège and Brussels, but these have turned out to be false. The German forces in Belgium are being increased, and are now said to number about 150,000. This, I think, indicates an attack on Ostend, and the capture or driving out of the force of English marines there, and possibly the beginning of the siege of Antwerp. This last event is foreshadowed by the fact that the Germans are bringing up heavy siege artillery, which would be useless except for this purpose.

The Servian invasion of Austria has not been successful, according to the latest advices, and the Servian army, after a disastrous skirmish with the Austrians, has retreated from Semlin, while the Austrians have again begun a bombardment of Belgrade both from the river and from Semlin.

In Eastern Prussia it clearly seems at this writing that the Russian General Rennenkampf has received another drubbing at Lyck. From the admissions, against their interest, of the Petrograd authorities, he is in retreat across the border in Russian Poland. Details of this action are lacking, but the corroboration appears certain, and it also appears most probable that the invasion of Berlin via East Prussia will be definitely abandoned.

This is not at all surprising in view of the facts that this would be by far the longest route, that the first line of defenses on the Vistula has not even been reached, and that in a very few weeks the western part of West Poland and East Prussia will be a sea of semi-liquid mud, to be succeeded almost immediately by untraversible snow. The route from the Russian border via Breslau would be shorter and easier.

In Galicia the Russians seem to be advancing. They claim to have practically captured the important fortress of Przemysl, and to have traversed the San River, and advanced on Rzeszru and Sanok, a short distance to the westward of this river, with their ultimate object the large and important city of Cracow. As these statements are flatly contradicted by the Austrians, it is a little difficult to form any clear idea of the actual situation.

The fighting in Africa between the Germans and English has been rather severe. In one day the toll of lives was four times what we lost at Vera Cruz. It is not surprising, however, in the midst of such more important events, that this phase of the war has been lost sight of. Japan is making little or no progress in her attack on Germany's East Asiatic colony. The bad weather prevailing in that part of the world is said to be responsible for this slowness.

A due regard for the space at my disposal will prevent my discussing the Turkish action in abolishing the capitulations, and in adopting a new tariff, things which are actualities and of importance, as well as the unrest among the Mohammedans in northern Africa and Egypt.

On the ocean matters have been very quiet. There have been, as usual, rumors galore, but of actual occurrences none, or so nearly none as not to be really worth chronicling.

when all its events and circumstances can be seen in their entirety and in their true relation," was the sincerest form of neutrality.

As a matter of fact the press has printed as many and as responsible denials of the atrocities as it has printed responsible charges.

The chief satisfaction the public can have at the present time is found in the President's reminder that the nations of Europe ultimately will determine the consequences and relative responsibilities where wrongs have been committed; if not, public opinion will do so.

Meanwhile the attitude of the American people upon all phases of the war should be that suggested by the wise words of President Wilson, viz.: a "reservation of judgment until the end of the war, when all its events and circumstances can be seen in their entirety and in their true relation."

He saw before him the end of his peaceful existence among his simple people who respected and loved him; he would not go, of course—wounded pride had spoken then—but the old quiet charm of life had been rudely broken and nothing could avail to mend it. He was angry at the poor wretch who was the cause of it all, and he was angry and saddened at his own emotions. Was it not the shameless selfishness of this very man that had sent him out of the world and forced him to take refuge in this backwater of civilization among the hills? Was it not he who had driven the sensitive scholar, smarting under the stings of public criticism, out of his career and into this hermitage, this desert? And now, when he had grown to love his prison, to think of the country-folk who came to his church from the scattered farms, down the rocky mountain-roads, as his own people, and of the friendly hills towering above as if he had been born among them, came this same man and with his soiled hand rubbed and blurred the fair picture and tore down the tranquil nest. It made it worse for him when he remembered that his brother was, too probably, at the end of life—was, indeed, coming home to die. The rector hated himself.

He came out of the trees now and was upon the long road that led down the mountain. He was surprised to find how light it was still, after the shadowy dusk of the wood. The same strange sense took him of entering into a cathedral, a temple, a house not made with hands. The air was absolutely motionless, but a delicious coolness lay about him like the coolness in some vast dim sanctuary. The sun had just dropped behind the line of the hills, but the west was full of light. There was no pomp of crimson and purple, not a bar of gorgeous cloud—nothing but an infinite depth of clearest golden light that seemed to reach out and glorify and illumine the entire atmosphere. The woods that bordered the road stood transformed and holy in the golden stillness.

Slowly the rector descended the mountain. He could not but feel calmed and hushed by all this tranquil beauty; it seemed to him as though an unseen hand, hardly to be felt, yet infinitely tender, had laid itself upon him. For a moment he almost forgot the miserable thoughts that had tormented him.

Then he noticed that all this gentle hush, this sweet surrender, was because the tired world was coming home to rest. It was as if a mother were slowly drawing the curtains and lighting the bedroom candles before calling her brood to bed. The evening hour had always seemed sacred and mysterious to him—now he saw why. It was the time when everything must be yielded up, the workman's tool no less than the child's toy, when the tired body must lay itself down and the tired spirit put its trust, however trembling, in something other than itself, for it could care for itself no longer. The rector thought of some words that had always held him: "Man goeth forth to his work, and to his labor, until the evening." And immediately he remembered also those other words, "The evening brings a' hame."

Robert was perhaps coming home tonight.

The rector was smitten with a vast strange pity and sorrow that surged over him like a flood. Old Christie's words sang themselves again and again in his awakened brain—"The evening brings a' hame." It was evening now, and Robert, whose evening lamp was burning low, was coming home—his brother, who had no one to come to but him. "The evening brings a' hame."

He remembered a short cut through the woods that would bring him down the mountain sooner, and turned in among the trees again. In a moment he had dipped into a large hollow, an ancient lake-bed, full of rustling grasses, and low wood growth, and walled in on three sides by the whispering trees, but open to the sky like a great cup. The solemn stillness was broken now by the tiny voices of the million little forest-folk going to rest. He heard the whir of the insects in the long grass, the stir of the innumerable living things among the tall ferns and creeping vines; the very leaves seemed alive that rustled and fluttered unceasingly and the faint wind that swept over and over them saying hush! hush! He thought he could hear the very earth breathe. He looked up into the mysterious trees. They were full of birds, flying and settling and calling, all turning home. Above his head the pale violet sky soared high and clear into infinity. And yet it was all so common, so natural; all this went on every evening and he had watched it a hundred times; why did it seem so wonderful to him now? Scraps of lines that he loved came unbidden into the rector's brain—"The sparrow hath found her an house, and the swallow a nest where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts"—"Let my prayer be set forth in thy sight as the incense, and let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice." As he crossed the quiet dell the light faded out of the clear air, leaving it a transparent violet. Out of the long grass at his feet a tiny brown rabbit leaped and scurried again into the shadows. He heard the squirrels chattering, and one darted up a low branch before his eyes. A flight of swallows wending south rose suddenly above the wall of foliage on his left, etched themselves for a moment, sharp and black, against the wonderful sky, and were gone.

The rector was conscious of a great awe, as of one standing in a king's presence-chamber. He ceased to think of Robert, he ceased to think of himself, he knew only the sweet scene about him, and to himself he said, "The evening brings a' hame!" He was near the edge of the dell, where the footpath joined the mountain road once more, when suddenly at his very feet he saw a spring of water gushing from the ground, bright, cold, bubbling up among all the green growth, a live thing, rising unbidden by man out of the bosom of the earth, mysterious, holy, a sacred well. When he saw that the rector went down on his knees.

Twilight had fallen as he came down the mountain-road. The woods were black on either side, the violet sky had turned to gray. One great star burned like a diamond in the west. As he drew near the first house a light sprang up in a window, and he heard a woman's voice call from the doorway, "Children, it's time for tea!" He came upon the three children as they ran in through the garden gate. Farther down he met a man driving his empty cart homeward; at the next house a woman stood at the door, baby on arm, while two little boys tore down the road to meet their father. A supper bell rang two fields away.

He was at the foot of the mountain now, and it was quite dark. The meadows, knee-deep in grass and flowers, lay dimly spread out beside the railroad track. There was a light in the little station building, and a light in the rectory at the top of the slope beyond. Two belated little boys ran past him as he crossed the track; the younger was barefooted and stumbled, clinging to his brother's hand. The next moment a nearby gate clicked behind them. It all seemed so supremely natural, so absolutely right, that the rector was not surprised when a dark, bent figure rose up out of the shadows before his own door and took a doubtful step towards him. He held out both hands to his brother.

"Robert," said the rector, "I'm so glad you've come home."

Important Announcement

The Scofield Bible Correspondence Course is now owned and conducted by The Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago. This course, established over twenty years ago by Dr. I. C. Scofield, has enrolled students in all parts of the world.

It is distinct from the following four strong correspondence courses which have been given by the Institute for many years:

Synthetic Bible Study
Bible Doctrine
Practical Christian Work
Chapter Summary

These five courses offer systematic and comprehensive instruction in Bible Study and methods of Christian Work.

They have enabled many who otherwise would not have been able to do so to avail themselves of the opportunity of Bible study. Many years' experience with correspondence instruction has shown it to be both feasible and practical.

Questions and Answers

T. E. P., Marion, N. C. Is a Christian bound to strive constantly after the highest possible attainments, to live, as it were, in a constant strain; or is it required only that he abstain from all evil, and live a normal, resting life? This question was suggested to me by the following quotation in a religious paper: "The highest way is the only way for a child of God."

There can be no doubt that a Christian must aim at the highest spiritual attainments. But there are many misconceptions of what those highest attainments are. They certainly do not mean that a Christian should be under a "constant strain," if by that is meant a restless, anxious, irritated life. It is from precisely this kind of spiritual "strain" that Christ came to relieve us. A great Bible word is "rest." Christ came to substitute God's strength for our strength in spiritual efforts. "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says (4: 10): "He that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works as God did from his." Whittier prays:

"Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of thy peace."

But as the soul enters into those higher places of rest and peace there will be still great activities in service. The rest saints are those who are under the power of a great, passionate desire to serve and help others. But such a life is delightfully "normal," and also usually "restful." Try to free them anxieties about self, and put in service for others in the name of Jesus, and it is the life not only of highest duty but of highest delight.

Reader, Vermontville, Mich. The passage in Rom. 8: 28 in the original is more striking: "We know that to them that love God, all things work together for good, even to them who are called," etc. This is an assurance that, whatever may come to us, he will cover us with his loving providence and will not suffer his beneficent purpose in our behalf to be turned aside, if we fully trust him. Even in such a case as you describe, hard though it may be for a time, there is reason to believe that the influence of a godly, praying, believing wife will eventually be made a blessing to the whole household.

Mrs. N. A. P. Do you think God would be pleased with one who, after professing to be truly converted, should purchase a moving-picture outfit, and follow up picnics and gatherings of all kinds in the community, giving exhibitions?

There are not many things in the world, just now, that a man could do more good with than a moving-picture machine. Schools, lyceums and churches are realizing how valuable they are for imparting useful information and for awakening ambitions to right, helpful and efficient living. A Christian in the moving-picture business has the opportunity of demonstrating that the things which are clean, noble, helpful and beautiful are more interesting and delightful than what is base. It is proper not only to interest and inspire people, but also to amuse them. Wholesome and interesting series can be shown in motion pictures, and even between reels if they are clean and wholesome, cannot be objected to, because they minister to the universal and normal human appetite for merriment. It is, however, a fearful thing, that Christian men or organizations, professing to help and uplift people by these means, are so careless or so unconscious as to produce exhibitions of harmful and degrading tendency.

C. R., Galt, Cal., sends this note, which describes an experience that is, unfortunately, possible in any one of a hundred places where impure literature is permitted to enter. He writes: "Matters came to me and I think of a once happy home which has been completely broken up by separation of wife from husband, through the reading of vile literature in a peculiar class of magazines. There is room for fear that the best foundations of many homes are affected by this evil. In the home to which I refer, the husband subscribed to an old and well-known New York magazine. It has always been a clean and interesting monthly. Being a busy man, he had but little time for reading, but he often spent some time in perusing the magazine. One day the husband took a look at it, and found a complete change of character in some of the articles. Then he discovered that the magazine had changed ownership. More and more articles of the same class appeared. He did not like to stop taking it until the subscription had run out. He regrets today that he did not stop receiving it into his home at once. The poison took effect on the wife, who had carefully read several of the most objectionable contributions. She followed the course outlined in the impure articles in question, and today she is separated from her husband, and the once happy home is completely broken up. This is only one instance of the work of indecent literature. You cannot be too pointed in your caution to Christian homes against such literature."

Mrs. C. W. R., Maple Falls, Wash. 1. The words of Jesus in Matt. 18: 8-10 point out the wickedness of those who, by evil example, and by permitting their impure inclinations, their quarrelsome and revengeful dispositions, their unworthy aims and ambitions to stand in the way of others and prevent them from seeking salvation. It is as though he had said there would be stumblings and pitfalls enough through the world's treatment of young and inexperienced souls without any addition from the disciples, and he warns them not to share in such wickedness, as the one who after having himself received light, wilfully caused others to stumble was doubly an offender. Far better were it for him to make any personal sacrifice than to be the means of causing a weaker brother or sister to stumble and lose faith. 2. The writer you quote meant that Christ's mission was misunderstood, not that He himself misunderstood it.

Reader, Louisville, Kan. Although the Israelites unquestionably had their flocks and herds with them when they entered the desert, they soon found the herbage scanty, and began to murmur when they contrasted their state with the abundance of Egypt. How they were satisfied is told in Ex. 16. Bread and flesh were the chief demand and these were miraculously supplied, saving the lives and preserving the health and vigor of the people and also saving such flocks as they had, which otherwise would soon have been consumed.

You Must Act At Once

Have you secured your Holy Land Souvenir? If not, you must act AT ONCE! Today, September 30th, was announced as the last day on which coupons might be mailed. In view of the fact, however, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published on September 30th, we have decided to extend the offer for three days more. So you must have your coupons signed and mailed before Saturday next.

Each coupon calls for a four months' new subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at half price. If you cannot induce a friend to subscribe for half price, you may make your friend or acquaintance a present of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in which case you should fill out one or more coupons and mail them at once, accompanied by 25 cents each, and the Souvenir or Souvenirs to which you are entitled will be sent you FREE of charge.

If you have no coupons convenient simply write us a letter, giving the names and addresses and enclosing the remittance at our risk.

These Souvenirs Are for You

P. W. D., Bristol, Conn. Where a churc member disparages another member an spreads detrimental reports about him, it should be the pastor's duty to try, with kindly Christian tact, to heal the breach and set mat ters right. While we know nothing of the de tails of the case you mention, we feel assure that there is a way to reconciliation an amendment. Slanderers and deriders shoul not be allowed free course in a professedl Christian church. Even though the man wer the worst of sinners, his repentance and h desire for Gospel light ought to assure him o a welcome among those who came to seek an save "to the uttermost."

C. M. T., Wilmington, Del. The endowmen of tongues was first imparted to the apostle and apparently to the whole assembly of th disciples on the day of Pentecost. Their sub sequent use in the early church was a subjec of frequent disputation. Paul seems to have placed it lowest in the scale of gifts (see I Cor 12: 30, 31; also 14: 5). Its use in the churc today is not encouraged.

Mrs. M. M. S., Wenico, Ark. 1. The ques tion is controversial. 2. The passage in I Cor 11: 13-15 is an appeal to the sense of decorum which had been offended by women speakin unveiled, contrary to Oriental usage. The apostle held that it was better to do all things in order and not to adopt methods which would violate custom and bring disapprobation and contempt on the Lord's work.

Reader, Newbury, Mass. 1. The spread of Christianity throughout the world is a topic too vast for the Mail-Bag. Read Two Thousand Years of Missions before Carey, by L. C. Barnes, or any good cyclopedia of missions. 2. There have been many unacknowledged claim ants to thrones, that of England among the number, but no one who is not familiar with genealogy can judge of the merits of such cases.

C. F. K., Oroville, Wash. 1. Answering by mail. 2. There are many passages in the Bible which are capable of being distorted, just as there are many things in our ordinary every-day life which are liable to be misrepresented. The Bible teaching favors temperance in all things, and wherever there is a possibility of our use of anything in nature becoming a means of misleading others, we are taught to deny ourselves, in order that we may not become a stumbling-block to others.

F. A. L. F., Highland, N. Y. Matt. 18: 18 grants to all of the apostles the same power with regard to admission to and rejection from the membership of the church, which had already been given to Peter, so that all were equally recognized and equipped with the same authority. The apostles were never empowered, as the Roman Church claims, to personally forgive, but simply to declare God's will and readiness to pardon the repentant sinner. The Lutherans hold that they were endowed with authority to forgive and to condemn.

H. W. EAKINS

This is a recent picture of Mr. H. W. Eakins, the man who made $1,500 in one month with a Long Crispette machine in a store window.

I'll now help other men to start in the same business

What are you going to do during the winter months? Just barely earn a living? Carve out your own destiny — stop waiting, dreaming and doubting—become a force that meets the world on its own basis and gets its share.

This handsome Springfield store is the result of my doing the very thing I am asking of you.

I learned how to make fortune smile on me in a dignified, honorable, profitable business. I have made a success—can look the whole world in the face and am respected by my friends and neighbors.

YOU CAN DO THE SAME

Somewhere in your town there is a small vacant store, a part of the building, a window, a nook where the rent is low. There you can set up your machine and make and sell Crispettes.

Every 20c invested returns $1.00 in cash — not theory — not guess work—not mere imagination, but the actual bona fide records of profits from Crispette merchants the country over.

You don't need experience to start but initiative. The place is anywhere.

There's a demand in your locality. No matter if you live in a town of 500 population or more. Why not reap the harvest ready for you? You have been looking for a good chance and here it is. To the right man in each community I've got a great proposition to make. Are you one of them?

Think of the fortunes made of 5c pieces—street cars, moving picture shows, chewing gum, 5 and 10c stores. Every one will spend a nickel—every one likes Crispettes—children, parents, old folks.

Come to See Me at My Expense

I'll pay your traveling expenses within a 300 mile radius if you buy a machine.

I'll give you reference after reference to responsible merchants, bankers, citizens—satisfy yourself, then let's go over the Crispette business together.

W. Z. LONG.

Success Is Yours If You Go After It

A splendid opportunity faces you. It may never come your way again. Can you afford to pass it by? Decide now to gain success. Assert yourself—be independent—discover the hidden powers in your nature. Cut loose from irksome tasks — long hours — poor pay. Enjoy the fruits of your own labor yourself. Reap the benefits of your efforts. Work all or part time —just evenings if you wish. At least investigate. Get full particulars—reports from users. See what others have done. Judge what you can do. Act now. Use the coupon.

PROOF FROM OTHERS

W. A. Phillips. "I started the 9th of last month and have cashed in up to date $1,435 with the season just starting. I thank the lucky stars I have taken hold of this business."

E. H. H., Pennsylvania. "Although I have been in the business for some time, sales were never better. For the week ending October 16, Crispettes sales were 6,445 rolls, and this week will be even better. Over 12,000 rolls in 2 weeks is not so bad."

I have many letters which show how pleased people are to become merchants. People soon realize that it is a dignified, clean business.

Write for my 36-page book, "How to Make Money in the Crispette Business." Read it, then come to Springfield.

You Have a "Friend" in the Wholesale Stove Business

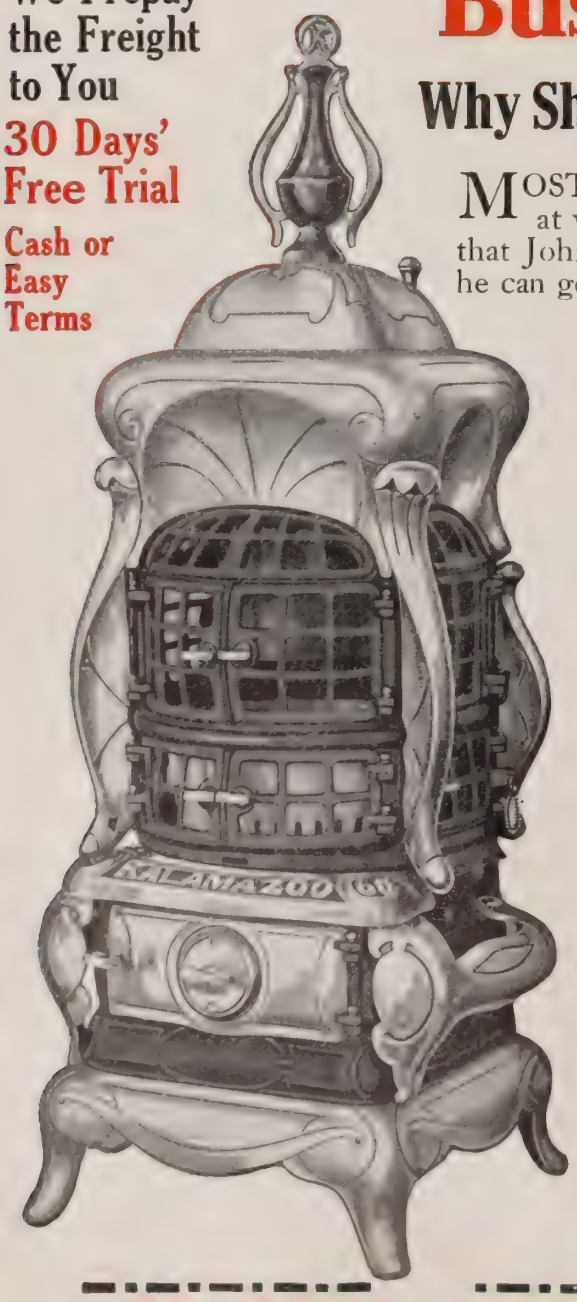
This FREE Book Has Proved the Price and Quality Friend to 275,000 Stove Buyers

Mail Coupon or Postal for It Today

We Prepay the Freight to You

30 Days' Free Trial

Cash or Easy Terms



Why Should You Pay Retail Prices?

MOST of us have had a chance now and then to buy something at wholesale. We have needed this or that or the other thing and have remembered that John or George, or some one else we know, is connected with that business. "Surely he can get us an inside price"—we say. And sure enough he can and does.

But better than any chance you have had at a wholesale price is this offer on stoves—"A Kalamazoo Direct to You."

This means not only wholesale but factory price.

No personal friend in the stove business, for instance, could do as much for you as the Kalamazoo Catalog.

It comes direct from the makers. It quotes you the makers' price, delivered to your railroad station free.

It shows you 500 styles and sizes—not just a few that you have to like.

It says to you: Try the one you like at this low price. Try it free thirty days. Don't send us the money. Don't even deposit the full price.

If after the free trial the stove or range or furnace or kitchen kabinet, whatever it may be, isn't exactly what you want, if it hasn't proved its extra big value for the low price—then ship it back at our expense.

And after the 30 days' free trial you still have a whole year in which to test the stove. If any flaws develop, you have just as strong a claim on us ten months after purchase as you have ten days after.

The Kalamazoo book offers easy terms, too. Factory price, free trial, no freight for you to pay—and in addition take many months to pay if you like.

The Inside Story of Stove Making and Buying. High Prices Exposed

Write for the Kalamazoo Catalog now. No matter where you expect to buy. It will make you a better judge of stoves than the dealer. It will make you a judge of fair prices. It will show you the latest improvements. It will teach you the economical way of buying. Your saving will be $5.00 to $40.00, according to what you need.

These are not promises. The Kalamazoo book—the "friend" that has saved $5.00 to $40.00 each for 275,000 families—doesn't make promises. It's all in black and white agreements—backed by a $100,000.00 Bank Bond Guarantee with the 1st National Bank of Kalamazoo.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE MOSQUE OVER THE CAVE OF MACHPELAH, WHERE ABRAHAM, ISAAC, JACOB, AND THEIR WIVES WERE BURIED

A VISIT TO THE PATRIARCHS' TOMBS

BY PROFESSOR GEORGE L. ROBINSON, Ph.D.

Director of the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem

ON TUESDAY, April 7, 1914, the United States ambassador to Turkey, Hon. Henry Morgenthau, with his suite, visited the sacred enclosure which marks the site of the ancient cave of Machpelah, which Abraham purchased from the children of Heth 2100 B.C. (Gen. 23). The present writer was kindly invited to join the ambassador's party. With one exception, Mr. Morgenthau was the first non-Moslem to visit the shrine this century. The last English-speaking party was there in 1898. During the nineteenth century only an occasional party are known to have entered. Probably not more than a score of persons living, besides Mohammedans, can boast of having looked upon the traditional tombs of the patriarchs. A special irade, or decree, from the Sultan in Constantinople is necessary to gain admittance. Without this it is vain to expect to enter; for the Moslems of Hebron are very fanatical, often treating with open insult every visitor to their city.

THE CENOTAPH OF THE PATRIARCH JACOB

Among the distinguished visitors to this shrine during the past century were the late King Edward VII, as Prince of Wales, accompanied by Dean Stanley, in 1862; the Marquis of Bute in 1866; Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales, with the celebrated archeologists Sir Charles Wilson and Captain Conder, in 1882; and in 1898 our own American minister and plenipotentiary to Turkey, the Hon. James P. Angell, who included in his party Consul and Mrs. Edwin S. Wallace of Jerusalem, Rev. Putnam Cady of New York, and Dr. and Mrs. Alexander Paterson of Hebron. In Mr. Morgenthau's party this year, besides his wife and daughter, there were Dr. W. W. Peet of Constantinople, President Howard S. Bliss and Dr. Franklin E. Hoskins of Beirut, President Samuel B. McCormick of Pittsburg, Professor Jeremiah Zimmerman of Syracuse, Mr. John Nevin Sayre of Princeton, Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Dodge of Beirut, and Mr. John D. Whiting of Jerusalem, besides several attachés of the United States embassy in Constantinople, and of the United States consulate in Jerusalem. The Hon. James Bryce and Lady Bryce, who accidentally accompanied us, were handed, while passing through the enclosure, their own special irade, which had been sent by telegraph.

JOSEPH'S CENOTAPH

THE ENTRANCE

The enclosure which has in due time been built over the Cave of Machpelah, and in which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and their wives, Sarah, Rebekah and Leah, were buried (Gen. 23: 9; 25: 9; 49: 30, 31; 50: 13), is called by the Arabs the Haram, or sacred area. In keeping with Moslem custom we removed our shoes before entering. The entire structure consists of a quadrangular wall, the length running northwest and southeast, 197x111 feet, 40 feet high and eight feet thick. It is built of magnificent embossed blocks of gray, hard limestone, just like those in the enclosing wall of the Haram, or temple area, in Jerusalem. Its date is certainly not later than the time of Herod the Great, and it may well be as early as the period of the Hebrews, possibly of Rehoboam, Solomon, or even David. Within it are a mosque, a porch, an open quadrangle, and the dwellings of dervishes, saints and guardians. It is approached by two flights of steps on the north and south ends, but "unbelievers" may ascend as far as the sixth step on the south side only. Opposite the fifth step there is a hole in the wall "as long as a lance," which is said to extend down to the cave underneath. On Fridays, the Jews assemble here and continue to pray and lament, as they have done there during the past five hundred years.

THE CENOTAPH OF ABRAHAM'S WIFE, SARAH

The mosque occupies the southernmost portion of the enclosure. It was formerly a church which was built (or repaired) by the Crusaders between 1167 and 1187. It is of Gothic architecture, and measures 93x70 feet. Certain portions of the walls may date from the time of Justinian in the sixth century. Four large pillars support the roof. Within, many interesting objects attract the visitor's eye. One is the richly carved mimbar, or pulpit, which was brought by Saladin from Ascalon; another, the mahala, or platform, from which the Koran is read; still another, the mihrab, or prayer niche, which shows the worshiper the direction of Mecca. A Greek inscription on the southeast wall records an invocation to Abraham, said to date probably from the time of Justinian. But most interesting, most conspicuous, and most important of all are the cenotaphs or sepulchers of Isaac and Rebecca, which stand opposite each other in the two aisles of the mosque, and which are thought to be directly over the original tombs of the patriarch and his wife in the cave below. They are covered with the favorite Mohammedan colors, green and crimson.

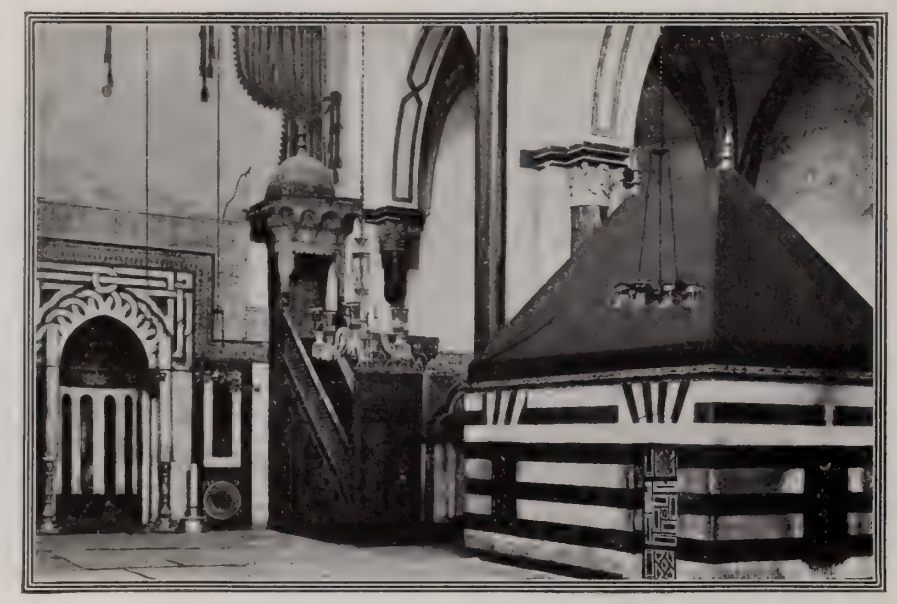
To the south of the mosque and adjoining it is the narthex, or porch, bearing an inscription which states that it was restored in 1755. The porch has heavy pillars and a vaulted roof. Within are two octagonal shrines, or oratorios, containing the cenotaphs of Abraham and Sarah. These we were shown first; the sheikh of the mosque allowing us to enter that of Abraham, and to walk about the tomb of the great father of the Hebrew race. It was a rich and precious experience for many of us. The shrine of Sarah, on the other hand, was not entered; nor was it by Princes Albert Victor and George in 1882. It is really possible to see everything without entering through the open grating of the iron door. Silver lamps, ostrich shells and Korans are the chief decorations of the shrines.

The open quadrangle or courtyard is the only portion of the interior open to the air. There are few objects of special interest in it besides a sundial high up on the wall and a little to the right of the door leading to the chambers on the extreme north. These chambers are approached through a spacious vestibule. In the chamber on the west is to be found the cenotaph of Jacob, while Leah's stands in that on the east. They are covered with green and crimson silk, and, like the others, are inscribed with letters of gold. The ladies of our party were by special courtesy of the sheikhs allowed to enter the chamber of Leah and examine the tomb on all four sides.

In addition to these six tombs of the three patriarchs and their wives, the Moslems claim to have another, that of Joseph. But according to Joshua 24: 32, Joseph was buried in Shechem, and the Moslems in Shechem claim that the one there is the genuine tomb of the great Egyptian vizier. The tradition in Hebron is doubtless only the reflection of an ancient Jewish jealousy which at one time sought to deprive the Samaritans of all their sacred sites. The reputed shrine of Joseph is situated in a building which has been added to the Haram enclosure on the northwest, and is reached through a vaulted gallery. The cenotaph is covered with pale green silk. Two minarets grace the edifice, rising, respectively, from the northwest and southeast corners. We did not ascend either one of them, but returned to the mosque to review what we had seen, and to examine more closely the possible entrances to the cave, or caves, below. The name "Machpelah" in Hebrew (which occurs only in Genesis and always with the article) signifies "the double cave"; the idea being that the patriarchs and their wives were buried in separate cavities. There are two openings in the floor of the mosque leading to these cavities: one by the mimbar, or pulpit, and the other near Rebekah's cenotaph. Twenty-four steps are said to exist by which the descent into them can be made. One cave is supposed to be situated under the cenotaph of Isaac, and the other under that of Rebekah.

But both of these openings are now, alas! barred with stones and plaster and fastened with iron clamps, and it is impossible to descend into them. That there are caves beneath is evident from the fact that the floor of the mosque is some fifteen feet higher than the level of the street. Moreover, there is a deep cistern, with a perforated rock or boulder over its mouth, at the north side of the mosque, into which burning lamps hang suspended by chains, and on the floor of which one can see countless scraps of paper whereon pious worshipers have registered their vows and supplications. These caves are by far the most interesting and important portion of the enclosure. The archeologist ardently longs to descend into them but they have not been entered, it is said, for at least 700 years. Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela in 1163 is supposed to have visited them, but it is uncertain that he did. Probably no Christian has ever entered them. The Moslems fear to do so. Ibrahim Pasha in 1834, on being let down into one of the caverns from the mosque, was quickly brought up again, he being suddenly smitten, it is said, with the impropriety of looking on another man's wife. What yet remains to future explorers of Machpelah, therefore, is to penetrate into these caves and describe them to those who are not so fortunate. This can best, perhaps only, be done through the co-operation of the Moslems themselves.



THE CENOTAPH OF THE PATRIARCH ISAAC

No site is more authentic or important in all Palestine, except it be the temple area at Jerusalem; for as Sir Charles Warren has well said "The cave of Machpelah is the one ancient burying-place which has been handed down with certainty as a genuine site."

DENOMINATIONAL NOTES OF INTEREST FROM THE FIELD

AT THE secretary's office of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Dr. S. Earl Taylor said that nearly three hundred of their clergy had gone to the front with the French armies, and that in South Germany about all the German Methodist ministers had gone to war with the Kaiser. The Frankfort Methodist Theological Seminary had been closed owing to the fact that all the students had been called into service. Since Turkey began mobilizing her troops, renewed alarm is expressed by officials of the board here for the safety of missionaries in Algeria and Tunis. The financial problem in India and Eastern Asia remains unchanged, and missionaries are still facing serious troubles. The latest cable from Bishop J. L. Nuelsen in charge of the board's affairs in Switzerland, says that churches and congregations are disrupted and homes and families are broken up.

The employed officers of the Young Men's Christian Association in the Northwest meet in conference every summer for a week of counsel, fellowship and prayer. Included in this group are men from isolated posts in logging, mining and construction camps. A feature of the industrial group at Delano Beach, Puget Sound, this year, was the presentation of the two opposing sides of labor unionism by able men. There is a beautiful, spreading maple tree at Delano which the Industrial group have made their own. It is their "Prayer Tree." Under its shade they gather and pledge themselves to keep the prayer circle unbroken until they meet again under the Prayer Tree.

Both in Germany and Russia the Baptists are very strong. At the secretary's office of the Board of Home Missions it is said that the war has made inroads upon their missionary lines, calling into service missionaries of foreign birth from the various fields, and not a few who are on furlough in America. Two French missionaries in this country were ordered for duty in France, and are now on their way over there; the Baptist Society is paying their salaries to their wives. The board believes there should on no account be a "let down" in contributions from the churches. On the contrary, there should be an increase owing to the gravity of conditions, increased expense to the board, and the pressing need of missionary work, to say nothing of the cost of living, which seems to be increasing.

Before the outbreak of the European war, notice had been received of the appointment of forty-eight commissions in the United States, Canada, South America, England, Scotland, Ireland, Europe, Australia, South Africa, India and China to cooperate in holding a World Conference on the Faith and Order of the Christian Church to consider practical unity. Other commissions were in process of appointment, so that it can be said that the proposal has the approval of the Anglican Communion throughout the world, of the leading Protestant communions in all English-speaking countries, of the Old Catholic Churches of Europe, and the warm sympathy of dignitaries of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church and of many leading Roman Catholics in different parts of the world. Almost every one in Great Britain and on the Continent of Europe who knew of the proposal recognized it as embodying the most important question before the Christian world.

One of the first and greatest lessons of this war is that only by unity in the one Lord Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace, can Christians help to make the kingdoms of the world the kingdom of the Lord and of his Christ. Although plans for the conference must now be suspended, there is much which can be done to forward the principle at stake. We can pray that God will hasten the time when this world-wide effort for Christian unity may be resumed. We can spread among friends and members of our several congregations the knowledge of the plans and purposes of the conference. We can promote small gatherings of members of different communions, first and foremost for united intercession for unity. We can do our utmost to bring together the divisions of the communion to which we belong.

After prolonged suspense concerning the location of leaders of the church who are in Europe at the present time, the Board of Foreign Missions at New York has received the following cable from Bishop J. L. Nuelsen, Zürich, Switzerland: "Bishop L. B. Wilson, President E. S. Tipple of Drew Theological Seminary, and President Samuel Dickie of Albion College have gone from Constance, Germany, to England; Bishop W. F. Anderson, Dr. W. B. Hollingshead, apportionment secretary of the commission on finance of the Methodist Church, Philadelphia, Pa., and Mrs. Frederick F. Lindsay corresponding secretary of the Minneapolis Branch, Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, are in Switzerland. American missionaries are respected in fields of action."

"We are gratified by the receipt of a cable from the Executive Committee of the Shantung Mission as follows: 'Tsingtau American Mission is well and safe.' The members of the Tsingtau Station who are now on the field are as follows: The Rev. and Mrs. T. H. Montgomery, the Rev. Courtland Van Deusen, Mr. Paul G. Cassat, Miss Helen E. Christman. The Rev. and Mrs. Charles E. Scott and Miss Effie B. Cooper, M.D. and other members of the station, are in America on furlough. We hope that relatives and friends of our Tsingtau missionaries will not be unduly alarmed, as Tsingtau is the only one of our nine stations in the Province of Shantung which is occupied by the Germans. Several of the others are within easy reach by railway, and the Tsingtau missionaries can easily go to one of these stations, if indeed they have not already gone. Our special anxiety is for the Chinese Christians, most of whom will probably be compelled to leave their homes, and will suffer the loss of their earthly possessions."

At the office of the Home Missionary Department it is said the war will affect this work in the lake regions, because immigration will cease. The enormous amount of work done by foreigners in Minnesota can hardly be conceived. The miners dug out in one project there more dirt than would cover the entire area of the Panama Canal. A cable has just been received advising the safety of Dr. C. L. Thompson, secretary of the Home Board, and his wife and daughter. He had gone over to attend the Peace Conference in Switzerland.

THE ANSWER

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

LIFE, Death, and Love once stood beside a field,
Where men had fought with sword, and gun, and shield,
And as they stood Life spoke with bated breath
And said, "I wonder when the foes will yield?"

Then Death with hollow eyes looked at the men
Who gasping lay about his feet, and then—
"I think," he said, "when all the world is drenched
In blood, the strife will finish—only then!"

But Love looked far away with tear-filled eyes.
"My friends," he said, "beyond the sun there lies
A land where flowers bloom with perfume sweet,
Where no one suffers pain, and no one dies.

"And in this country at the rainbow's end
There lives a King who is a Helper, Friend;
Who pardons sin and washes guilt away,
And when men know his love, the war will end."

The Malaysia Conference is one of the many Methodist mission conferences that are scattered throughout the world. It has its annual meetings just as the conferences have at home. The annual conference for 1914 was held in Singapore in January, and lasted for six days. It was presided over by Bishop J. E. Robinson, of Bangalore, India. A very interesting feature of this conference was that the important affairs were always translated into Chinese for the members who are Chinese. There were two secretaries, a Chinese native and one of the regular American missionaries. The minutes every day were read in two languages and approved. The significance of this is that the Chinese have made themselves felt in this place, and in numbers and energy outstrip the native Malay beyond comparison. There are forty-five members of this conference and twenty-five of them are American missionaries. This little spiritual band looks after the needs of 40,000,000 Chinese, Indians, Japanese, Malays, Javanese and Eurasians. I must not forget the noble band of women, about seventy-five strong, among whom are forty-five American missionaries. We have in our schools at present about 7,000 boys and girls. The day of objection is gone out here, no one need hesitate to present Christ to these boys and girls, and one would be greatly surprised how eager some of them are to know all about Christianity.

PERILS OF LIFE IN THE ARCTIC

UNUSUALLY long has the winter held its sway this year. All the month of May passed by with hardly any warm weather, and even to the middle of June we could go about with a sledge and dogs anywhere on the bays. Only at the end of that month warm weather set in and in the first days of July the ice broke up and drifted out to sea.

The belt of ice that holds our coast in its tight grip for about seven to eight months, and shuts us off from all connection by sea with the outside world, varies in breadth in different winters, according to the prevailing winds. East winds often break up the ice outside the islands, while with the cold west winds the ice forms and extends farther out into the sea. Last winter west winds were ruling and consequently the ice belt was very broad.

The border of the ice is a frequented hunting place of the Eskimo. He will travel there with his Eskimo sledge and dogs early in the morning on a fine day and then sit all day near the edge of the ice, waiting with his gun for any seals that may show up in the water. If, fortunately, he kills a seal, he pushes out his kajak—which he always will take with him for this hunt—into the water and rows out to harpoon the seal and tow it to the ice.

This much-loved seal-hunting at the sina (edge of the ice) is often attended with hardships and dangers. Very often the hunter has to sleep out on the ice for a night or two if bad weather sets in to prevent his going home, or if the sina is too far out to return the same day. In such case he simply turns over his low kommatic (sledge) and crawls under it, just as he is, in his skin suit, and that often at a temperature of 25 to 30 degrees below zero. Then the getting in and out of the kajak at the edge of the slippery ice is often dangerous. But the most dreaded thing at this hunting-place is the breaking off of a large part of the ice and drifting out to sea. It has happened now and then that one or two men have been carried out to sea in this way, never turning up again.

SUMMER AT MAKKOVIK, MORAVIAN MISSION STATION

One of our Eskimos went with his half-grown son to the sina at the end of January. The edge was far away, about twenty miles or rather more, and it was afternoon when they reached the water. They were soon glad to see several seals near by and managed to secure two of them before dark. As the hunting seemed favorable they intended to stay out a few nights. They had brought with them a snow-knife (18 to 24 inches long, for cutting square blocks out of the hard snow) in order to be able to build a little snow house. They went back from the edge for about a hundred yards and there put up their little snow hut. In the night the man looked out once to see if all was safe and was rather surprised to find that the weather had changed and it had begun to snow. But it was pitch-dark and he went back to wait for the morning, intending to return home. At dawn he looked out again. The wind had sprung up and it was snowing heavily. Suddenly his eyes were attracted by something moving nearby. He could hardly believe what he saw, for it made him shudder. The sea, which had been at least one hundred yards off from their camp in the evening, had become restless and the waves moved up and down at only twenty feet distant from where he stood. The ice was breaking up and they were already far out at sea!

IN SEALSKIN SUIT

Not a minute dare they lose now. The two seals were lashed upon the kommatic, the dogs were harnessed and the party went toward the nearest island. They had hardly gone a hundred yards, when they heard a loud crack right behind them. Looking back they saw that a large pan of ice had broken off and the floe on which their camp had been pitched had drifted off to sea. A few minutes later and they would have been lost. Horrified, they hurried up the dogs to increase their speed. The wind had now developed nearly into a storm. The snow was drifting into their faces and cut like needles; but they paid no heed to it. They would not sit on the kommatic, but ran alongside and made the dogs go still faster. The dogs were getting stupid, the snow drifted into their eyes and they tried to turn around to get the wind from the side. Thus they made but slow progress.

Again and again they plainly heard the cracking of the ice close behind them and saw large pans of ice drift away. The boy was soon overcome with fatigue, and had to lie down on the kommatic. But the father, who had gone through similar experiences before, knew that to give up now would mean certain death to both. He lifted his voice in a hurried prayer to God for help and then, taking new courage, went forward to the dogs, took the trace of the leader himself and went in front in the direction towards the next island, so that the other dogs had to follow. For hours he struggled on. At last they gained a safe distance from the raging waves behind and at 4 o'clock in the afternoon reached the shelter of the island.

They were wet right through and worn out, especially the boy, who was almost frozen. In the morning's haste they had forgotten the snow-knife and could not build a snow house, so they took off their mittens and dug with their fingers a hole in the side of a snowbank, into which they crept for the night. On the following day the blizzard abated and they were able to travel home. It took a few days before they got over their exhaustion, but besides frozen fingers they had no further after effects and were soon able to go about their work again.

Not long after this adventure the father came to see me. He said he had always been a good church-goer, but there had been very little sincerity in his religion. But God, in his mercy, had opened his eyes through this experience and in his answer to their prayer for help.

FLOWERS FOR THE DEAD

BY BETH SLATER WHITSON

"WE ain't got a single flow'r, Lige, to put in her po'r little hands."

Aily lifted a tear-stained, grief-worn face to Lige's similarly marked one, as she sobbed the pitiful admission.

Death had come suddenly and unexpectedly the night before to the little house and the youngest of Lige and Aily's brood had answered the summons so promptly as to leave the parents bewildered and stunned. They clung to each other like frightened children, as they bent over the tiny rigid form.

A cheap little dress of coarse lawn but seemed to accentuate the sharpness of the pinched baby face, making it appear strangely old in the early morning light. There were no dainty frills of silk and lace to soften the grimness of it all, and the motherly neighbor who had performed this last sad task of robing, and who had searched vainly—even among her own few poor belongings—for a bit of something to make death seem less austere and unlovely, looked on with blurred vision, understanding the yearning in the mother cry, "not even one flower for the poor little hands."

A bleak, bitter wind blew in through a broken pane which had been partially repaired with a bit of pasteboard; and Aily shivered as it pierced her thin clothing in the fireless room.

"Maybe she wouldn't a got the croup if we'd a lived in a decent-like house, Lige," she mourned. "If you could jest a got on the engine job sooner so's we could a moved som'ers else, it mightn't a happened. She must a got too cold night b'fore last when the snow blow'd in so hard. O—it seems like I jest cain't stand fer her to be took so sudden like. Seems I jest—" her voice broke in a little wail.

"Don't take on so hard, Aily girl," Lige urged, his own face convulsed with grief. "You air goin' to be sick, Honey, if you keep on like this, and I don't know what I'd do then—"

"She loved flow'rs so much, Lige," continued Aily, unheeding. "She used to ketch her little fingers in them store flow'rs on my hat. If I'd jest a know'd this was a comin' I'd a took'm off fer her. Reck'n she'd love to hold'm now, Lige? I'm a goin' to put'm in her little hands, anyway," she wept.

An answering sob came from Lige, and Aily went on talking in the same low, heart-broken voice.

"I guess we orta not grieve fer her, Lige. She's a-goin' to miss a tur'ible lot of trouble and suff'rin' and sorrer by goin' like this, when she's jest a baby. I can might' near be glad fer her that she won't ever grow up and be a mother of little fellers, and have to lay awake lots of nights a-wonderin' if they air cold, and not any more coverin' to put on'm. But it—it seems pow'rful hard fer us, Lige, fer her to go jest when we was gettin' so's we might a fixed her and the rest of'm sort o' like other folks's children. Seems like all the things we want the hardest—allers come a little too late—don't it, Lige?"

Lige bowed his head on the drab one in agreement, and for a moment both cried aloud—as only the poor and uncultured are privileged to weep over their dead. Then the motherly neighbor drew the coarse sheet gently over the little, silent figure again, and still holding tightly each other's hands, Aily and Lige went sorrowfully from the spare room of the little house of the very poor.

At the company's office, before a cheering fire, Herrin, Anderson and Blake—respectively, superintendent, general manager and bookkeeper for the Warner Coal and Iron Company, were discussing the sudden rise in pig iron when the door opened, admitting "Lige" and letting in a blast of wind that made Anderson frown slightly as he, with the others, looked up inquiringly at the newcomer.

Lige paused hesitatingly, near the center of the room. He had been a worker on the furnace "dump" until two weeks before when a vacancy had occurred and he had been promoted to the "engines," and he had the habitual stoop of the "dump" men, whose duty it was to shovel and cart away the slag from the wide mouth of the mammoth iron plant. Today there was an added droop of weariness to his rounded shoulders and the hand holding a battered old hat trembled visibly as he sought for words to explain his errand.

"What's the matter you are not working today, Lige?" he asked. "I thought you were on the day shift this week."

"I—I—am, Mister Her'in, but my baby—died las' night."

There was something in the simple, direct explanation which sent a chilly, uncomfortable sensation down the spine of each listener, like a strong draft, and the comfortable room seemed suddenly cold and cheerless.

Herrin glanced sharply at Blake, and Blake nodded:

"Yes," he affirmed, "I had forgotten to mention it."

THE NATION'S GREAT HEART TOUCHED

ALL CLASSES RESPONDING TO THE APPEAL FOR THE SUFFERING WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF EUROPE'S TERRIBLE WAR

A GREAT wave of Christian sympathy is flowing out from Christian America to suffering Europe. This is a time when all classes have a duty to perform in relieving such distress as the world has never seen till now. It would be difficult, indeed, to imagine any one so indifferent to suffering or so ungrateful for God's blessings and mercies to our own land, as to turn a deaf ear to the call that is now coming to us across the Atlantic.

Every mail brings increasing numbers of responses to our appeal for the Silent Sufferers—the widows and orphans of Europe's war. A large majority of the letters contain not only gifts for the Relief Fund but earnest prayers for the sufferers and for the restoration of peace. We quote from a few of the hundreds of letters that are now being received:

Mrs. J. A., Winchester, Va. ($5): "Please accept the widow's mite and may God's blessing go with it is my prayer." Mr. and Mrs. T. R. N., Chatham, N. Y. ($2), "to be applied to the general fund for the Silent Sufferers of the war. It is such a little drop; but it will buy a few loaves for some of our hungry and grief-stricken sisters." Mrs. R. W., Savannah, Ga. ($2): "My heart aches for those suffering in this poor world and for the blindness of the masses who do not read the warnings to be ready." B. J. S., Perry, N. Y. ($10): "This goes with my earnest prayer for the early, speedy overthrow of this horrible war."

"This morning," writes Mrs. J. E. L., Tishomingo, Okla. ($3.75), "my CHRISTIAN HERALD came and I had just written a letter and check for goods for a dress, and when I read your call for help for the poor sufferers, I said I could do without the dress and give my little mite to you, to help to relieve those whose sufferings are so terrible." Mr. and Mrs. J. S., Carbondale, Pa. ($2), write: "We are sending this for the Silent Sufferers in Europe, as we think they are worthy of our help. We have many loved ones over there and we pray that God may take care of them."

FUGITIVES WITH THEIR FEW BELONGINGS CAMPING IN FIELD NEAR ANTWERP

A Touching Gift

Very touching is the following from Miss B. T. W., Abbeville, S. C.: "I am sending you for your Silent Sufferers' Relief Fund $1.50. It is only a little, it is true, but I hope it will reach the saddest, most helpless little child in Europe and will be the means of bringing a smile to the mother of that child! My heart goes out in love and pity and sympathy to these helpless ones."

R. E. H., Americus, Kan. ($5), writes: "This is to be used to help feed and clothe the poor suffering widows and orphans—refugees of the war. May the good Lord who pities all cause this awful holocaust and the sympathy and help which it may call forth, to work together to the great end of bringing the nations more and more to put their trust in him who is the God of peace and not of war."

The Van Allen children of Newkirk, Okla., send $2 "to be used in the general fund." Their mother writes: "It is accompanied by our prayer that it may, in its small measure, be the means of bringing relief to some unfortunate. Oh, how my heart aches as I read of the suffering and sorrow! I have a small family of my own and it touches me when I think of the wrecked homes. My own children are sending $1 with the sincere prayer that peace may speedily come and that God will comfort the poor sufferers."

"The account of the sufferings of the widows and orphans by the war in Europe has touched my heart," writes "Isa much," Nazareth, Pa., "and I enclose my offering ($45) for the Relief Fund. I am praying daily that the God of Peace will say unto the turbulent passions of men, "Thus far and no farther shalt thou go. Peace, be still!" Mrs. A. H., Fallen Timber, Pa. ($2), writes: "I have been praying for the Silent Sufferers. I will send a little help to them, and I pray that God may bless those dear ones who could not avert this war and yet must suffer." "I am glad you make it possible for us to help suffering humanity when and where such help is needed," writes Mrs. J. S., Harrisburg, Pa. ($5). R. W. W., Elberton, Ga., sends $1 for the widows and orphans and adds: "May God overrule this war for the good of all nations and may peace soon be restored." "In Jesus' Name, I send this gift ($2) to be used where most needed," writes one who signs himself "A Friend of All," Biddeford, Me.

Widespread Suffering in Belgium

Streams of Belgian refugees continue to pour across the border into France and Holland, seeking places where food and shelter may be secured. Many of them have found their way to England. They tell heart-breaking stories of their experiences. In villages where there were many comfortable homes, there is now absolutely nothing but blackened ruins.

But the suffering is not confined to Belgium and France. Along the border provinces of Germany, east, south and west, the havoc wrought by war is strikingly apparent. The German losses in battle have taken from many thousands of homes their heads and bread-winners, and have cast on the world a countless army of widows and orphans. The same is true in a large measure of Russia, Austria, England and Servia.

Relief work in Germany among the poor has begun in earnest. The American colony in Munich has been especially active. One of the committees appointed by the colony is for the distribution of food to poor children.

One of the most painful effects of the war in Germany is the throwing out of employment of thousands of Protestant clergymen. Their parishes are broken up by the severing of families and the general movement towards the larger towns, and they are left without homes and destitute. These middle-aged men and their families are thus dependent by hundreds on the bare charity of their neighbors, or the pittance which comes from public funds. They have not the meager allowance of thirteen cents a day, which women receive who are wives, mothers, or sisters of soldiers, with half that amount for each child, but these clergymen's families must exist on almost nothing.

While thirteen cents may seem a small allowance to Americans, we must remember that soups, black bread, and cabbage go a long way to sustain life, although such articles as eggs and other semi-luxuries have a tendency to mount up in price. In Hamburg, an egg costs twenty-five cents.

Sorrow in German Homes

There is new cause for sorrow in many parts of Germany, especially in Saxony, during the last few days, for boys under eighteen have now been called out to service, away from their mothers and their homes. The writer has seen a photograph of a scene in a Saxon railroad station where a mother is embracing her red-cheeked boy in his soldier cap on the platform. The picture is called, "Sometimes There Are no Cheers as the Troops Leave for the Front."

In Belgium, which is, as has been said, the scene of the greatest suffering in Europe, since it is the gathering place for three armies, we find as elsewhere, the suffering relieved by acts of neighborly kindness. "In Antwerp," says Madame Vandervelde, wife of the head of the Belgian Commission, "the poor peasants who have come in from the country get a good bowl of soup with meat and vegetables in it, every day from the city, free. But this local relief cannot last much longer, since they are coming in by the thousands. You must remember that all Belgium, except Flanders (an area about as large as Massachusetts), is simply laid bare. Smoking ruins replace the farms. I was driving through one of these districts recently and saw, standing by the chimney, among the ashes of their house, which had been leveled to the ground to make a free area for cannonading by the Belgians themselves, an old couple, wringing their hands and weeping. All they had in life was gone. It was the most touching sight I ever saw."

At Ostend, we learn that the families who with their four or five children were camping out in bath houses, have been taken care of by private families. Some of them have been sent to England. The exposure proved to be too much for the children. Madame Vandervelde said in addition: "When anybody makes bread in Belgium, now, they take half the loaf to the sufferers. I have seen them coming in from the country with almost nothing on, sometimes only a night gown, with their babies done up in blankets carried by the older children. The trouble with these people is that they have no future. There is nothing for them to go back to. It will be necessary not only to send them food and clothing and money now, but to start them in life again, as soon as possible."

What a New York Woman Saw

Mrs. Whitney Warren, of 16 East Forty-seventh Street, New York, tells of what she saw in Paris: "At the railway stations you see great throngs of women and children getting off from the trains, clad in their wooden shoes and kerchiefs. They are dirty and travel-stained. But beside these is a constant stream coming through the different gates of the city who have walked from all over northern and northeastern France. They are received by committees who gather them together in some central place and care for them there until they can find where they belong. In many cases, children have arrived alone, separated from their mothers, and not knowing where they came from. Seven little girls were taken by the soldiery, and would be cared for till at least some of their parents could be found. Refugees who have drifted to Paris in such numbers must be supported wholly by charity. A society called the National Relief furnishes a nourishing soup at five cents a bowl.

"I met an old woman near the gate, and asked her how far she had come. She held up her hands to show me two hundred miles. She was too weary to speak. 'Have you any money?' I asked. She shook her head. I gave her forty cents and told her where she could hire a mattress for ten cents to sleep on in one of the halls. This society of 'National Relief' can use a great deal of money. It is trying to return these people to their homes as quickly as the tide of war recedes. It is better that they should go back and begin again as soon as possible, even among the ashes and ruins. There are often a few houses standing, where they can take shelter."

In Vienna the situation is somewhat the same. The peasant people of Galicia, about four hundred miles away, have flocked there on foot or by train, and are daily arriving by hundreds. They are in a perfectly destitute condition, as the Russians have burned their villages and used up their provisions. Among them one sees old, bent men, carrying bundles, mothers with babies in their arms, boys, manfully shouldering the pack of family bedding—a few cattle rescued from the ruin—we see all the same signs of suffering as elsewhere among those who are taken unawares, and who are themselves blameless, and while seeking no war, have the burdens of it to bear.

Concluded from preceding page

Something of the desolation caused by the war is described by a letter in a despatch in the London Daily News, from one of its correspondents in France. He writes:

"The Marne Valley on Friday was miles and miles and miles of desolation. Wherever one moves in this war-swept valley, only a few days ago so peaceful and beautiful, one meets the same piteous sight, and so for miles and miles an uncanny silence reigns. The world is holding its breath shocked and terrified.

"The writhing flames have sped over this sweet country, leaving it scarred and scorched. The slow waters of the Marne are no longer blue with heaven's soft reflection on a sunny day, but are livid and dreadfully malodorous with the swollen bodies of dead horses, hundreds and hundreds of them—aye, and men, too. A blind man could follow the track of this battle storm easily enough, and I have floundered along it until I am sick.

"I have neither heart nor pen to tell of these ghastly scenes. The fire is still smoldering over the shallow graves of the brave dead, entombed so hurriedly. One sees here and there in these gruesome cemeteries a brown hand thrust through the shoveled earth, as if beckoning, the hump of shoulder tunic and shoulder strap torn away. It is dreadful—think of it if you can. For more than one hundred miles behind the battle line these burying grounds mark the scenes of carnage."

The following constitute the Advisory Committee of the Christian Herald Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe:

J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., chairman (Presbyterian); David James Burrell, D.D., vice-chairman (Reformed); Dr. Junius B. Remensnyder, vice-chairman (Lutheran); Chas. A. Eaton, D.D. (Baptist); Bishop J. C. Hartzell (Methodist); Rev. Z. T. Sweeney (Church of Disciples); Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D. (Congregational); C. L. Goodell, D.D. (Methodist); Pastor D. H. Steffens (Lutheran); Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D. (Methodist).

Relief work in the field will be in charge of representative committees in all the countries affected by the war. It is to be clearly borne in mind that the work is not designed to prolong the war by healing the wounded and sending them to the front again to fight; but it is wholly in behalf of the helpless widows of the war and their fatherless children—the "Silent Sufferers," who are now to be numbered by hundreds of thousands and for whom no provision has yet been made.

THE PEACEMAKERS

*A SERMON BY REV. DANIEL L. MARSH

"Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called sons of God." Matt. 5: 9, R. V.

THE making of peace occupied a large place in the mission and message of Jesus. In prophetic anticipation he was described as the "Prince of Peace," who should inaugurate a reign of peace. On that first Chrismas night so long ago, there broke upon the startled ears of Judea's shepherds watching their flocks by night the only angels' song ever heard by the children of earth, and the moving refrain of that song was: "Peace on earth." "Peace be unto you" was the form of salutation he instructed his disciples to use: and "Go in peace" was the benediction he pronounced upon those whom he had healed of physical and spiritual maladies. The peace which was an essential part of the character of Jesus was unaffected by external circumstances. It was like a water lily whose bloom is tossed to and fro by shifting winds and waves, but which is unmoved from its place, because its roots are sunk in the soil beneath. Thus at the very time that the bloodhounds of Jewish hate were dogging him to death, he turned to his disciples and bequeathed to them that which he possessed in so great abundance, saying: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you."

In a peculiar sense Jesus is the Son of God; and by the influence of his words and work, by his life and by his death, he is pre-eminently the Peacemaker. But in the introduction to his Sermon on the Mount he invites all people everywhere to become co-workers with him in the accomplishing of his mighty mission, saying: "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called sons of God." That is, if peace-receivers become transformed into peace-diffusers they are but reflecting the "God of peace"; and the family resemblance is so striking that "they shall be called sons of God." Christ's parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost boy, are parables of divine joy at restoration of that which was lost, and they are also parables of divine example. If we would be worthy of sonship we must be just as diligent in the work of recovery, restoration and reconciliation as were the shepherd, the woman, and the father pictured in the parables. After telling these parables it would have been quite fitting for Jesus to use the words that he did use at another time: "Peace be unto you: as the Father hath sent me, even so send I you!" Now, the inquiry that I make in this sermon is this: into what fields of activity does the Prince of Peace call us to co-operate with himself in the making of peace?

Peace with Ourselves

FIRST OF ALL IS PEACE with ourselves, or our own consciences. This comes from a reconciliation to God, which is the gift of Christ, and is wrought in us by his Spirit.

When God gives peace it is not a peace that is superimposed like a hat on the head, but a holy harmony springs up in the heart. But we must do our part in bringing about this peace with ourselves. It is only when we come to him for pardon that we find peace. It is only when we have made him king of our lives that he can establish the reign of peace within. Now, how is it with us? Are we uneasy, impatient, fretful, fearful? Is our peace slain by the dart of a guilty conscience dipped in the poison of past wrong-doing? Or have we heard the Saviour's word: "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven"?

When D. L. Moody was in Pittsburg, not long before his death, he related an experience that he had had as a worker on the Christian Commission during the Civil War. He said that one day he went across the battlefield after the fight, and he found a boy with shattered limbs; he looked as if he were dead. He used some of the water in his canteen to moisten the boy's lips, and the little fellow opened his eyes. He thought it was the chaplain beside him, and when Mr. Moody asked him if there was anything he could do for him, he said: "Well, chaplain, if you can put your hand in my pocket and pull out the little Testament my mother gave me, you might read to me." Mr. Moody said that when he put his hand in to take the book, the blood of the boy was on his hand and on the book, too. "Where shall I read?" He hesitated a moment, and then answered, "You might read the 'peace chapter'; you know which one that is." Mr. Moody turned to the fourteenth chapter of St. John and read twenty-six verses—and the boy lay still. Mr. Moody wondered if he was hearing it. He began with the twenty-seventh verse, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you," and he got no further, for the little fellow tried to raise his hand as he whispered: "You need not read any more; I have that peace, oh, I have it!" and his eyes went shut, and you could almost hear the brushing of the angels' wings as they took him. Now, I insist that we may have peace like that; for "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee."

Peace with God

SECOND IS PEACE WITH GOD. This second field of activity is only a widening out of the first; for no one can truly be at peace with himself until he is at peace with God. But my reason for making a second division of it is this: that we are to be peacemakers by bringing others into a saving knowledge of the "God of peace." Thus will the peace-partakers become peacemakers. Paul tells us that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," and then in the very next sentence he says, "We are ambassadors therefore on behalf of Christ, as though God were entreating by us: we beseech you on behalf of Christ, be ye reconciled to God."

Toward the close of the War of 1812-'14 gloom had settled over the whole country—harbors blockaded, commerce destroyed, produce moldering in warehouses, currency depreciated. In February a ship drew near to New York bringing the commissioners from Ghent, and the news that the treaty of peace was signed. Then men rushed breathless to and about the city, shouting: "Peace! Peace!" So we are messengers for the Prince of Peace. If we have found Christ for ourselves we are under obligation to hunt up others and bring them to him. Do you remember how the straightforward account runs, that when Andrew had found Jesus, "he findeth first his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found Christ. He brought him to Jesus." We are saved to be savers of others. It is so easy to fall into the habit of waiting for some tidal wave of revivalism to sweep men and women into the kingdom, or to expect the minister to do all the work of winning souls. But the work of personal work for souls is the work of every Christian. The underlying reason for personal work is personal religion.

Peace with Other Men

IN THE THIRD PLACE, THE PRINCE OF PEACE came to reconcile the differences of men. He traced the course by his example and teaching; but how much there is yet for peacemakers to do! How much of strife and contention there is in the world! People grow angry, and then nurse their anger. It is the bane of family life. Husbands and wives separate, and brothers and sisters quarrel. Members of the same church, professing to be followers of the same Lord, refuse to speak to one another. Men fall out over business matters, and cease not nursing their wrath until the subject of it dies. Men allow differences in politics to crystallize into malice. Grievances and misunderstandings banish the peace that ought to exist between capital and labor, and, as a result, strikes and lockouts and cruel revenges follow each other with weary monotony. Reading the daily account of class struggle and race riots leads one almost to believe that men have no regard at all for Him who said: "Be at peace one with another."

The saddest thing about all this is that people who are quick-tempered, sensitive, revengeful, jealous are not sorry about it, but rather seem to be proud of it. They seem not to know that it is a terrible defect of character. Our Lord declares that anger in the heart is murder, and that our only safety is in a prompt reconciliation when our brother has aught against us. He does not enter into the thought of what we have against our brother, for he has taught his disciples that hardest of all lessons contained in the words: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you." The world says that "revenge is sweet." But the revenge of Christ, which is the revenge of love, is sweeter. Therefore, cultivate peace. Be peaceful yourself. Meet your difficulties and bear your burdens with holy serenity. With the peace of Christ in your own heart, carry the Christ of peace into the jangling, discordant world about you.

Peace Is Opposed to War

IN THE FOURTH PLACE, I urge upon you that peace is opposed to war. Nations are still so foolish as to seek to settle their difficulties by a method that selects for survival the weak, and dooms to destruction the strong! It is even so. History appears to be written with the sword and cannon, instead of with the pen. Tribes and nations have used the rude arbitrament of strength, and have sought to settle their disputes by sheathing their swords in the breasts of brother men. You hear the shock of sword on sword, and the scream of dying men, and the sobbing of women and children for fathers and husbands and lovers and sons; and you will see a wilderness of graves. Plowshares have been allowed to rust, while the swords have not been given a chance to rest.

Advocates of universal peace produce many arguments for disarmament and the abolition of war. We are told that sixty-five per cent. of our national income is now expended on war past and present. That leaves only thirty-five dollars out of every hundred dollars of our national resources for constructive purposes. Some one has estimated that the cost of a first-class battleship equals the valuation of all the land and ninety-four buildings of Harvard University, plus all the land and buildings of Hampton and Tuskegee Institutes. Think of what could be done with the money spent on armaments! The hungry could be fed; the naked could be clothed; every child could be given an education; forests could be restored; deserts could be irrigated; swamps could be reclaimed; taxes could be lifted from the poor man's bread and home and clothes; the industrial order could be ameliorated; and the Gospel of the Prince of Peace could be carried to the uttermost parts of the earth. But war puts farther away the dawn of the day of human brotherhood. It is cruel: it entails physical sufferings upon the soldiers at the front, and mental torture upon the loved ones left at home. War is devilish: it develops the devil-like in man.

But would it be safe for a single nation to disarm? Yes—when the Sermon on the Mount becomes the Magna Charta of that nation's life; when the Golden Rule becomes the rule of its conduct; when the spirit of the Good Samaritan becomes its interpreter of international law; when its character becomes one of altruism and self-denying love; when its liberty and life become more desirable to the other nations of the earth than its destruction—then will it be safe for a nation to disarm. In a day not far away there will be no use for either an army or a navy to act as an international police.

You ask, "Can I be a peacemaker in this realm also? What can I do to hasten the coming of the day of universal peace?" You can do much. For one thing, you can remember that our government is a democracy, and that you are responsible to the full extent of your influence for the policy pursued. Then again, you can help to turn the sword into a plowshare by making it evident to the rest of the world that the same soldierly excellence, the same chivalric spirit, the same moral qualities, which the poets have taught the world to believe are developed by war, can be developed by the Christian volunteer in the warfare of spiritual conquest. Another very important thing that you can do is to diffuse the doctrine of Jesus here at

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, October 11. Matthew 16: 13, 15. "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am? But whom say ye that I am?" Our Lord has now reached the northernmost part of Palestine. He had come to his own, and "his own received him not." Misunderstood by many of the common people, misrepresented by the leaders of the nation, he has pressed forward in his mission undismayed. The final crisis of his life-work is near. He is beginning to prepare his disciples for the great ordeal through which he and all who have allied themselves with him must pass. The disciples must see clearly the line of division that runs between their view of Christ and that of all other men. He calls for the opinion of the men of his times concerning himself, only to have the disciples reject those opinions and substitute for them the true view of him as the Son of man and the Son of God. Consciously and intelligently the disciples are made to array themselves by their own choice against the men of this world, who may say a great many good and true and beautiful things about Christ, may elevate him above every other man on earth, and yet miss the chief point in the correct estimate of Jesus. You have, no doubt, read and heard the opinions of many people in and outside of the church about Christ—what is he to you? Has this Sunday served to make you understand him better, love him more fervently, trust him more implicitly, or do you waver with the fickle, unspirited multitude in your estimate of him? What do you say about him?

MONDAY, October 12. Matthew 16: 17. "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father, which is in heaven." Peter, ardent and forward as he had shown himself on previous occasions, acts as spokesman of the disciples, to all of whom the question of our Lord had been addressed and all of whom cordially endorsed Peter's answer. Any assumed superiority of Peter over the rest is, moreover, taken away by our Lord's answer. What Peter has truly spoken concerning Christ is the witness of God's Spirit in and through Peter. That spirit of faith was in all the disciples. It is in us who believe "not by our own reason or strength, but by the Holy Ghost who calls us." We are all Peters, says Luther, inasmuch as we believe, and we all claim Peter's blessing, inasmuch as we profess: "I believe that Jesus Christ, true God, begotten of the Father in eternity, and also true man, born of the Virgin Mary, is my Lord, who has redeemed me, a lost and condemned creature, purchased and won me, from all sins, from death, and the power of the devil, not with silver and gold, but with his holy, precious blood and with his innocent suffering and death, that I may be his own, and live under him in his kingdom, and serve him in everlasting righteousness, innocence, and blessedness, even as he is risen from the dead, lives and reigns to all eternity."

TUESDAY, October 13. Matthew 16: 18. "And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." "Peter" and "the rock" in this text are two different things. The former is called "Petros," the latter "petra" in the original Greek. By no rule of grammar does this text mean: Thou art Peter, and upon thee I will build, etc. Peter is a rock-man by reason of his faith in Christ. Christ himself is the rock on which the church, Peter included, is built. Other foundation can no man lay. He is the select and precious stone which the Lord has laid in Zion. He is the rock on which the wise builder sets up his house, which winds and floods cannot shake. Even if the picked forces of hell's legions were to join with all the forces of unbelief in this world in one mad rush on the cardinal truth of all the Scriptures, viz., that Christ is the God-man and our Redeemer, they would meet with defeat. All other ground, besides Christ, on which men are trying to set up their faith, is sinking sand. Men who profess Christ as Peter and, through him, all the disciples, had done, became through their preaching and living a solid ground on which their hearers may build themselves up in their most holy faith, and thus has the church been built up on the foundation of the apostles and prophets—not on the single Peter—but Jesus Christ is ever the chief cornerstone. Read what Peter himself has said about the Rock of Ages, our Lord Christ, in I Peter 2: 4-8.

WEDNESDAY, October 14. Matthew 16: 19. "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." The language of this text is altogether figurative. We shall meet with the same matter again, stated in plain terms. Moreover, the Lord speaks in the future tense, conveying a promise. This text must accordingly be studied together with other texts treating of the same matter and containing an explicit grant of spiritual power from Christ. The Lord had spoken of "building" his church. He himself will not build the church, but he will do so through human agents. This text tells how he intends to build his church. The church is the society of believers in Christ scattered throughout the world. Persons enter this society by having their sins removed. Admission to this society is denied to all who love their sins more than the Forgiver of sins, and who prefer to walk away from him rather than with him. This work of gathering believers, who as "lively stones" are built into the spiritual temple of the Lord, Christ carries on through his ministers, who, as Paul declares, are all ambassadors for Christ, urging men to be reconciled with God. That no prerogative of Peter is established from either text is plain from the connection: in Peter, the Lord simply addresses all his disciples, as whose spokesman Peter acted on this occasion. Accordingly, when the Lord on two later occasions (Matt. 18: 18; John 20: 23) repeated this message to his disciples, he omitted all special mention of Peter. The Roman Catholic Church, which makes so much of the keys of Peter, has lost the true meaning of this text. For the pure, free, unlimited Gospel of the forgiveness of sin has been buried in that church beneath the teaching of work-righteousness, indulgences, auricular confessions, penances, etc.

THURSDAY, October 15. Luke 9: 22. "The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be slain, and be raised the third day." Matthew, Mark, and Luke have noted, as a significant occurrence, that after Peter's confession in the territory of Cæsarea Philippi, the private instruction which the Lord administered to his disciples began to take an ominous turn. While he had on several previous occasions foreshadowed to them the pathetic ending of his career on earth in parabolic and figurative utterances, he now starts them on a special study, in plain and striking statements, of his great passion. He enumerates and describes the details of his suffering and the glory that should follow. The word "must" in this text deserves to be specially noted. It is not the must of fatalism but of mercy. The eternal counsel of God for man's salvation embraced the sacrifice of God's Son as a sin-offering for the whole world. In this sense Christ must suffer. But he went willingly forward to his awful task. What happened to him later was not an accident but a necessary link in the chain of redemptive work by which Christ reclaimed a lost world for God. He could truthfully say, despite this "must" in our text: "No man taketh my life from me; I have power to lay it down, and power to take it again." From now on our meditations are approaching the penumbra of that eclipse which, on Calvary, wrapped the Lord of glory in the gloom of everlasting despair. We shall still behold him manifesting, in word and deed, the fulness of that Godhead which dwelt in him bodily; but that must serve chiefly to make us see what a price has been paid for us.

FRIDAY, October 16. Matthew 16: 23. "Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art an offense unto me: for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men." If Peter had been appointed the foundation-rock of the church, and its chief builder, as some would have us believe, what would have become of the church? For Peter assails the central teaching of Scripture on which the church is built, the atonement of the world's guilt by the surrender into death of God's Son. He considers this an unnecessary sacrifice, and this teaching which is the very heart of the Gospel is hateful to him. In the eyes of his Master, Peter is become a veritable devil, and Christ speaks to Peter in almost the same terms that he addressed to the tempter in the desert. Peter's remark scandalizes our Lord. He considers Peter an obstacle in his way to the cross, and he tells Peter that his view of the sacrifice of the Lord is the miserable, would-be wisdom of a carnal mind, and not the expression of the faith of a child of God. The natural man to this day recoils from the contemplation of the passion of Christ, and considers it especially revolting that he should believe himself the cause of that suffering, and also the intended recipient of its blessed fruit of righteousness. Christ crucified has ever been, is now, and will ever be to the Greeks foolishness, and to the Jews a stumbling-block; but to all who believe, the crucified Lord will always represent the highest expression of the wisdom of God and the power of God, viz., for man's salvation.

SATURDAY, October 17. Mark 8: 34, 35. "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever shall save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's, the same shall save it." After rebuking Peter, our Lord turns to the multitudes. He has something to communicate that concerns all. If Peter's view of the cross of Christ were to become the prevailing view, the whole Christian religion would have to be changed. Not only is there in this religion, as the cardinal fact, the teaching of the cross of the Master, but there is also the teaching of the cross of his disciples. Of course, the disciples' cross has no atoning virtue; that feature belongs exclusively to the cross of Jesus. But the sin for which Christ died, and which is forgiven to all who believe in his sacrificial death, must be resisted to the blood by all who wish to be true followers of the sin-bearing and sin-destroying God-man. As Jesus denied himself the full and uninterrupted use of the divine glory while working out our salvation, so those who come to him and walk with him in this world must sacrifice wealth, ease, worldly preferment, the pride of intellect and of station. For the sake of Jesus and his Gospel, a true Christian will count the learning, riches, pleasures, and glory of this world as dross and dung. He has come to Jesus, not to lead an easy life of carnal self-gratification, but to gain his soul and life eternal. Losses incurred for Jesus' sake are immense gains; gains secured at the sacrifice of Jesus and his Gospel will prove ruinous losses in the end.

home, and throughout all the earth. Wherever the religion of Christ goes it subordinates the claim of individual rights to the social welfare. It is the only power in the world that can produce that love of justice, that merciful temper, that spirit of good will which will make arbitration pledges effective.

But the greatest thing that you can do is to prostrate yourself before God and receive from him the new heart. For it is only when the new heart has been lifted into social operation that we shall get a peace that can be trusted.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Independance Belge

THE event of the week in the operations of the war has been the sinking of the three British armored cruisers in the North Sea by a German submarine. These three cruisers, the Cressy, the Hogue and the Aboukir, sister ships of 12,000 tons burden, were cruising on blockade duty some distance to the westward of the Hook of Holland the morning of September 22. Suddenly, about 6 A. M., the Aboukir was torpedoed, the other two vessels went to her assistance, and while engaged in picking up her crew were themselves torpedoed. In twenty minutes all three had sunk, and some fourteen hundred men passed into eternity. About one-third of the crews were saved, some by Dutch vessels, which carried them into Holland ports.

The torpedoed cruisers were all fairly old, dating from 1901, and their loss will not impair the efficiency of the English fleet to any very great degree. German advices from Berlin state that this exploit was the work of the U9. Submarines in the German navy are distinguished by numbers only and not by names.

The importance of this action is that it is a vindication of the submarine as an offensive and defensive naval force. From the place where this last action took place to any German port of refuge is close to a hundred miles, which makes a fairly long cruising radius for these very dangerous and at the same time very frail craft. A few more such actions will sound the doom of the battleship. These expensive monsters will become obsolete, because, why invest eight or ten millions in a ship which cannot be defended against submarines, but at all times when near a coast is liable to their sudden and effective attack? Swift armored cruisers for attacking ocean going commerce on the high seas, and submarines, mines, torpedo boats, and land fortifications for coast defense would, in such case, be the naval programme of the future.

DINANT, TYPICAL OF THE BELGIAN TOWNS TAKEN BY THE GERMANS

While these things were occurring in the North Sea, the German cruisers were busy in other parts of the world. The German cruiser Koenigsberg entered Zanzibar harbor and engaged the British cruiser Pegasus. The result of the action was the beaching of the Pegasus with a British loss of 25 killed and 80 wounded. The casualties of the Koenigsberg are not known, as she left immediately after accomplishing her purpose.

The German cruiser Emden, which disappeared completely some seven weeks ago, reappeared suddenly in the Indian Ocean and captured six British merchantmen, whereof she sunk five, sending the sixth into port with the crews of the whole half-dozen aboard. Then after running in close to Madras and taking a few shots at that city, she disappeared again.

The British auxiliary cruiser Carmania, formerly a Cunarder running from New York, sank a German auxiliary cruiser, concerning whose name there is some doubt, off the South American coast.

The effect of the submarine raid in the North Sea on England has been, first to greatly astonish her, and secondly to enrage her. The press and people are calling for immediate action against the main German fleet, and beseeching the naval authorities to send the English fleet in and "drag the Germans out like rats" from their holes. All of which has a familiar sound, because I remember in the Spanish-American war the same sort of clamor by the American people when Sampson had Cervera penned in Santiago harbor. The Washington authorities did not order Sampson to attempt to go into the harbor of Santiago and drag out Cervera, probably losing his fleet in so doing, and it is most unlikely that the English Admiralty will order Jellicoe to attempt the impossible, and risk English naval supremacy foolishly.

One great advantage that Germany has in this war, is that the press and people are content to leave the management of the fleet and army in the hands of men who have been all their lives soldiers or sailors, whereas in England and here at home the opinions and clamors of the man in the street who has never seen a machine gun, and hardly knows a bayonet from a bugle, and of an equally ignorant press unfortunately have forced generals and admirals often and often to take action against which their every professional instinct revolted, and often with disastrous results to their own cause. Our Civil War history, until the coming of Grant, teems with illustrations of this very unfortunate failing.

REFUGEES TURNING TO WATCH THE BURNING OF THEIR HOMES

INHABITANTS OF A SHELLED TOWN VIEWING THEIR HOMES

REFUGEES, INCLUDING AMERICANS, WAITING OUTSIDE ROUEN STATION

For all intents and purposes, the line of battle between the Allies and the Germans in France is the same as it was last week. True, there have been successes here, and defeats suffered there, along the hundred and twenty mile line by each of the combatants, but these successes and defeats are relatively unimportant in that they have brought about no real modification of the German position on French soil.

The fighting has been severe, the severest in continuity, and also in casualties, which has yet been seen in this war, and under very adverse circumstances. The weather has been abominable, heavy rain falling almost incessantly. The trenches are half full of water, and the unfortunate soldiers, who must practically live in them, eat, sleep, fight, all in two or three feet of water with soft mud at the bottom, must have suffered horribly. Probably we shall soon begin to hear of much sickness, pneumonia, typhoid, etc., as a result of this exposure.

The German objectives in the battle still going on have been to capture the fortress of Verdun and to reduce

Rheims. In neither have they been successful. They are particularly anxious to take Verdun, because that is the key position in the chain of the French eastern defenses, Verdun, Toul, Nancy, Lunéville. Once master of Verdun, the others will follow with comparative ease, and without Verdun the others cannot be held.

Further to the eastward, in Alsace and Lorraine and the Vosges, the fighting has been more or less sporadic. The August fighting in the Vosges district must have been more severe than we had any idea of, the latest casualty list revealing that in three days one German regiment lost its colonel and 51 other officers, and nearly a third of its effectives (3,000 men) at St. Dié. Other regiments were nearly as badly punished.

Rheims has been severely attacked all through the week, being bombarded continuously. There is a little mystery connected with Rheims. It was for over ten days in German hands and was by them abandoned in favor of a position some few miles to the north. Had its possession been a matter of very great moment to the Germans, they would hardly have abandoned it without attempting a defense. I am, hence, strongly inclined to think that the attack along this line is more or less in the nature of a feint, the object of which is to keep as large a force as possible of the Allies busy here, while the real German attack is proceeding in the Verdun district.

During the early part of the week a report was in circulation that, as an effect of the bombardment, the famous and beautiful cathedral had been reduced to a mass of shapeless ruins. Had this been true, the artistic loss to the world would have been very great, as the noble pile is one of the finest examples of architectural skill existing, and ranks justly among the dozen best buildings of the world.

The French government, practically the day it received this report, seemingly without any attempt to verify it, addressed a burning protest to the neutral powers. Thereafter, it turned out that, far from being a mass of shapeless ruins, the cathedral was not injured beyond repair. This statement is founded on the reports of the correspondents of three London papers, who subsequently visited Rheims. The testimony of the Times correspondent is particularly strong, and to me testimony from the Times is the most convincing newspaper evidence that can be advanced, as I am sufficiently old-fashioned to consider it the most reliable newspaper published.

On the western end of the line the Allies have undertaken a flanking movement from Amiens northeasterly, the object being to envelope and crush the German right wing. This force advanced in its object as far as Peronne, a place nearly directly east of Amiens and south of Arias, when it was surprised to find a German army entrenched and apparently awaiting it, in a position running from what was supposed to be the extreme right of the German right wing at Noyon, as far west as the Belgian border, just above Lille. The effect of this is to nullify the flanking movement completely. This state of affairs should have the effect of greatly lengthening the line of battle.

How long a time this battle, or rather series of combats, on a long but united front will last, is more than problematic. My idea is that the Germans wish to tire the Allies out by forcing them continually to assault. How the Allies are going to cause the situation to break is difficult to see. A rear attack from Ostend might accomplish this, but the movements of the German forces in Belgium recently seem to indicate that the Germans are taking up positions which would render any such attempt on the part of the Allies highly dangerous unless in overwhelming force.

It looks, on the whole, as though the question of power of endurance would be the deciding factor. England cannot send, for the moment, any large number of fresh troops; seventy to eighty thousand would probably be all she could assemble immediately. The first Canadian contingent is leaving this week, but it may be seriously doubted whether that force is yet in condition to take the firing line.

In Belgium the situation seems to be this: The Belgians are pursuing their usual policy of making sorties from Antwerp, with the object of necessitating the Germans to keep a large force in Belgium, thus preventing a considerable portion of this force from reinforcing the German army in France. The Germans have occupied in force positions between Antwerp and Ostend, so as to prevent any junction between the Belgian forces at Antwerp and the allied forces, either now at Ostend or which may arrive there. They also are making preparations to besiege Antwerp, but these preparations have been greatly delayed by the bad weather which prevails in Belgium as in France. The possession of Antwerp would be of great strategic advantage to the Germans.

BERLIN APPARENTLY NORMAL IN THE MIDST OF WAR

FRENCH INFANTRY ADVANCING TO TAKE UP NEW POSITION

I mentioned last week the effects of the new German heavy artillery on the Liège forts. Since then the details of the reduction of the Namur forts have come in, and they confirm the extraordinary piercing power of this artillery. It was a matter of minutes after the guns were in position before the forts were completely battered to pieces. The powder used is an improved lyddite which explodes in all directions. Mention is also made in this account of the fact that the persons within the radius of the explosive's fumes had the skin burned yellow. The fumes, for a considerable but definitely known distance, are deadly in their effect.

General French has made a further report of the recent operations of the British army, in which he states that the allied successes continue slow but uninterrupted, which has caused much rejoicing in England.

The English have lost some 1,100 officers killed, wounded and missing since the beginning of the campaign. This means that two out of five officers of the original expeditionary force are now hors de combat. Several hundred have been sent forward to supply the place of those gone, but the question of further supplies is becoming a very serious problem. Officers are greatly needed at home to train the newly raised troops. The number now available for that purpose is barely sufficient, and those now so employed are the only officers England has with which to keep the vacancies at the front filled. More will be heard of this in the future, and it is well to bear it in mind, as its effect on the war may be important. To train an officer requires years; it cannot be done in a moment.

It is reported that Asiatic cholera has broken out among the Austrian troops in Galicia and Hungary, and also among the Servian troops. If this is true, it is a fact of the first importance. There is no need to tell how terrible the disease is, how quickly and violently it works, and how difficult it is to localize and control. The present conditions, the bad weather, the enormous bodies of men gathered together under very bad sanitary conditions, and the impossibility of isolating the sufferers are most favorable for its rapid spread. The subject is of burning interest to all Europe, combatant or non-combatant, and in only a lesser degree to ourselves.

In East Prussia there have been no very startling results achieved in the last few days. Along the Russo-Austrian frontier and in Galicia, things still seem going badly for the Austrians, even after making all allowance for the exaggeration of the Russian bulletins. It appears that the Austrian troops have been obliged to completely retire from the river San and generally to draw back their lines in the direction of Cracow.

The Russians have not as yet actually captured the fortress of Przemysl, but have invested it and pushed their line further on towards Cracow, the Austrians retreating. The only strongholds in Galicia which are ranked as fortresses are Cracow and Przemysl. I mention this because nearly every day the Russians announce the capture of a fort or fortress.

What is really happening in the Servo-Austrian war it is impossible to say. The bulletins contradict each other so flatly, that the only thing safe to say is that there is a war between these two powers.

There have been many rumors of action by Italy and Roumania during the last few days, but Italy has not issued mobilization orders and shows no intention to do so.

Swift armored cruisers for attacking ocean-going commerce on the high seas, and submarines, mines, torpedo boats, and land fortifications for coast defense would, in such case, be the naval programme of the future.

While these things were occurring in the North Sea, the German cruisers were busy in other parts of the world. The German cruiser Koenigsberg entered Zanzibar harbor and engaged the British cruiser Pegasus. The result of the action was the beaching of the Pegasus with a British loss of 25 killed and 80 wounded. The casualties of the Koenigsberg are not known, as she left immediately after accomplishing her purpose.

The German cruiser Emden, which disappeared completely some seven weeks ago, reappeared suddenly in the Indian Ocean and captured six British merchantmen, whereof she sunk five, sending the sixth into port with the crews of the whole half-dozen aboard. Then after running in close to Madras and taking a few shots at that city, she disappeared again.

DINANT, TYPICAL OF THE BELGIAN TOWNS TAKEN BY THE GERMANS

The British auxiliary cruiser Carmania, formerly a Cunarder running from New York, sank a German auxiliary cruiser, concerning whose name there is some doubt, off the South American coast.

The effect of the submarine raid in the North Sea on England has been, first to greatly astonish her, and secondly to enrage her. The press and people are calling for immediate action against the main German fleet, and beseeching the naval authorities to send the English fleet in and "drag the Germans out like rats" from their holes. All of which has a familiar sound, because I remember in the Spanish-American war the same sort of clamor by the American people when Sampson had Cervera penned in Santiago harbor. The Washington authorities did not order Sampson to attempt to go into the harbor of Santiago and drag out Cervera, probably losing his fleet in so doing, and it is most unlikely that the English Admiralty will order Jellicoe to attempt the impossible, and risk English naval supremacy foolishly.

One great advantage that Germany has in this war, is that the press and people are content to leave the management of the fleet and army in the hands of men who have been all their lives soldiers or sailors, whereas in England and here at home the opinions and clamors of the man in the street who has never seen a machine gun, and hardly knows a bayonet from a bugle, and of an equally ignorant press unfortunately have forced generals and admirals often and often to take action against which their every professional instinct revolted, and often with disastrous results to their own cause. Our Civil War history, until the coming of Grant, teems with illustrations of this very unfortunate failing.

For all intents and purposes, the line of battle between the Allies and the Germans in France is the same as it was last week. True, there have been successes here, and defeats suffered there, along the hundred and twenty mile line by each of the combatants, but these successes and defeats are relatively unimportant in that they have brought about no real modification of the German position on French soil.

The fighting has been severe, the severest in continuity, and also in casualties, which has yet been seen in this war, and under very adverse circumstances. The weather has been abominable, heavy rain falling almost incessantly. The trenches are half full of water, and the unfortunate soldiers, who must practically live in them, eat, sleep, fight, all in two or three feet of water with soft mud at the bottom, must have suffered horribly. Probably we shall soon begin to hear of much sickness, pneumonia, typhoid, etc., as a result of this exposure.

The German objectives in the battle still going on have been to capture the fortress of Verdun and to reduce

Rheims. In neither have they been successful. They are particularly anxious to take Verdun, because that is the key position in the chain of the French eastern defenses, Verdun, Toul, Nancy, Lunéville. Once master of Verdun, the others will follow with comparative ease, and without Verdun the others cannot be held.

Further to the eastward, in Alsace and Lorraine and the Vosges, the fighting has been more or less sporadic. The August fighting in the Vosges district must have been more severe than we had any idea of, the latest casualty list revealing that in three days one German regiment lost its colonel and 51 other officers, and nearly a third of its effectives (3,000 men) at St. Dié. Other regiments were nearly as badly punished.

Rheims has been severely attacked all through the week, being bombarded continuously. There is a little mystery connected with Rheims. It was for over ten days in German hands and was by them abandoned in favor of a position some few miles to the north. Had its possession been a matter of very great moment to the Germans, they would hardly have abandoned it without attempting a defense. I am, hence, strongly inclined to think that the attack along this line is more or less in the nature of a feint, the object of which is to keep as large a force as possible of the Allies busy here, while the real German attack is proceeding in the Verdun district.

During the early part of the week a report was in circulation that, as an effect of the bombardment, the famous and beautiful cathedral had been reduced to a mass of shapeless ruins. Had this been true, the artistic loss to the world would have been very great, as the noble pile is one of the finest examples of architectural skill existing, and ranks justly among the dozen best buildings of the world.

The French government, practically the day it received this report, seemingly without any attempt to verify it, addressed a burning protest to the neutral powers. Thereafter, it turned out that, far from being a mass of shapeless ruins, the cathedral was not injured beyond repair. This statement is founded on the reports of the correspondents of three London papers, who subsequently visited Rheims. The testimony of the Times correspondent is particularly strong, and to me testimony from the Times is the most convincing newspaper evidence that can be advanced, as I am sufficiently old-fashioned to consider it the most reliable newspaper published.

On the western end of the line the Allies have undertaken a flanking movement from Amiens northeasterly, the object being to envelope and crush the German right wing. This force advanced in its object as far as Peronne, a place nearly directly east of Amiens and south of Arias, when it was surprised to find a German army entrenched and apparently awaiting it, in a position running from what was supposed to be the extreme right of the German right wing at Noyon, as far west as the Belgian border, just above Lille. The effect of this is to nullify the flanking movement completely. This state of affairs should have the effect of greatly lengthening the line of battle.

How long a time this battle, or rather series of combats, on a long but united front will last, is more than problematic. My idea is that the Germans wish to tire the Allies out by forcing them continually to assault. How the Allies are going to cause the situation to break is difficult to see. A rear attack from Ostend might accomplish this, but the movements of the German forces in Belgium recently seem to indicate that the Germans are taking up positions which would render any such attempt on the part of the Allies highly dangerous unless in overwhelming force.

It looks, on the whole, as though the question of power of endurance would be the deciding factor. England cannot send, for the moment, any large number of fresh troops; seventy to eighty thousand would probably be all she could assemble immediately. The first Canadian contingent is leaving this week, but it may be seriously doubted whether that force is yet in condition to take the firing line.

In Belgium the situation seems to be this: The Belgians are pursuing their usual policy of making sorties from Antwerp, with the object of necessitating the Germans to keep a large force in Belgium, thus preventing a considerable portion of this force from reinforcing the German army in France. The Germans have occupied in force positions between Antwerp and Ostend, so as to prevent any junction between the Belgian forces at Antwerp and the allied forces, either now at Ostend or which may arrive there. They also are making preparations to besiege Antwerp, but these preparations have been greatly delayed by the bad weather which prevails in Belgium as in France. The possession of Antwerp would be of great strategic advantage to the Germans.

BERLIN APPARENTLY NORMAL IN THE MIDST OF WAR

FRENCH INFANTRY ADVANCING TO TAKE UP NEW POSITION

I mentioned last week the effects of the new German heavy artillery on the Liège forts. Since then the details of the reduction of the Namur forts have come in, and they confirm the extraordinary piercing power of this artillery. It was a matter of minutes after the guns were in position before the forts were completely battered to pieces. The powder used is an improved lyddite which explodes in all directions. Mention is also made in this account of the fact that the persons within the radius of the explosive's fumes had the skin burned yellow. The fumes, for a considerable but definitely known distance, are deadly in their effect.

General French has made a further report of the recent operations of the British army, in which he states that the allied successes continue slow but uninterrupted, which has caused much rejoicing in England.

The English have lost some 1,100 officers killed, wounded and missing since the beginning of the campaign. This means that two out of five officers of the original expeditionary force are now hors de combat. Several hundred have been sent forward to supply the place of those gone, but the question of further supplies is becoming a very serious problem. Officers are greatly needed at home to train the newly raised troops. The number now available for that purpose is barely sufficient, and those now so employed are the only officers England has with which to keep the vacancies at the front filled. More will be heard of this in the future, and it is well to bear it in mind, as its effect on the war may be important. To train an officer requires years; it cannot be done in a moment.

It is reported that Asiatic cholera has broken out among the Austrian troops in Galicia and Hungary, and also among the Servian troops. If this is true, it is a fact of the first importance. There is no need to tell how terrible the disease is, how quickly and violently it works, and how difficult it is to localize and control. The present conditions, the bad weather, the enormous bodies of men gathered together under very bad sanitary conditions, and the impossibility of isolating the sufferers are most favorable for its rapid spread. The subject is of burning interest to all Europe, combatant or non-combatant, and in only a lesser degree to ourselves.

In East Prussia there have been no very startling results achieved in the last few days. Along the Russo-Austrian frontier and in Galicia, things still seem going badly for the Austrians, even after making all allowance for the exaggeration of the Russian bulletins. It appears that the Austrian troops have been obliged to completely retire from the river San and generally to draw back their lines in the direction of Cracow.

The Russians have not as yet actually captured the fortress of Przemysl, but have invested it and pushed their line further on towards Cracow, the Austrians retreating. The only strongholds in Galicia which are ranked as fortresses are Cracow and Przemysl. I mention this because nearly every day the Russians announce the capture of a fort or fortress.

What is really happening in the Servo-Austrian war it is impossible to say. The bulletins contradict each other so flatly, that the only thing safe to say is that there is a war between these two powers.

There have been many rumors of action by Italy and Roumania during the last few days, but Italy has not issued mobilization orders and shows no intention to do so.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

MAY RENEW TREATY RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA. Congress abrogated our treaty with Russia January 1, 1913, on the ground that Russia interpreted it as permitting exclusion of American Jews. A new treaty has waited on our initiative until now, when announcement comes from Russia that a peace commission treaty such as was recently arranged between this country and England, France, Spain and China, would be welcome. Sweden has agreed to sign a similar treaty, making twenty-eight countries that have entered into relations with the United States or are in process of doing so, by which disputes that cannot be settled by diplomacy will be referred to a permanent commission for one year.

MINISTERS AND JOURNALISTS DO NOT WORK. A newspaper tabulation by occupations of the 2,152,433 gainful workers in New York City, respectfully omits ministers and journalists, though including 27,324 teachers, 10,563 lawyers and judges, 8,241 physicians and surgeons, 12,519 bartenders, 55,408 accountants, 151,798 clerks, and varying numbers of seemingly every other occupation save those named above. The total population is about 5,800,000, 45.2 per cent. of whom labor for their living; males over ten years of age who labor, 1,566,240, or 82.1 per cent. of all; females, 586,193, or 36.6 per cent. There are, however, some 23,000 compositors and typesetters, implying a certain amount of journalistic activity for which doubtless compensation is paid, and it is certain that in New York there are ministers who receive salaries. So the omission must have been accidental.

PHILADELPHIA GETS OUT ITS SUNDAY CLOTHES. Great preparations are in progress in Philadelphia for the expected evangelistic campaign there in January under William A. Sunday's leadership, among the special activities being prayer groups for every block in the city, and men's Bible classes everywhere. The churches are organizing for the meetings, and the city will be divided into districts for advance work.

RECORD TIME IN LAND LITIGATION. A dispute over territory which began when Colombia and Costa Rica became independent of Spain has just been settled through arbitration by the award by Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court, of a large, fertile district comprising rich banana plantations, to Costa Rica. As the dispute was inherited from Colombia by Panama, the latter country is the loser.

TO MAKE US EAT MORE APPLES. With a bumper apple crop in sight and the European market for some 2,000,000 barrels shut off, the Department of Agriculture comes to the help of growers by suggesting the cultivation of the South American markets and the stimulation of home demand. To help along the latter excellent idea, it may be in order to remind readers that "they say" apples are splendid for the complexion.

TROLLEY LINKS PRODUCER AND CONSUMER. Trolley lines running into Philadelphia are to be given platform terminal facilities at points convenient to housewives with stalls which farmers and farmers only may lease for the marketing of produce brought in by trolley, housewife organizations to notify the farmers daily how much stuff is needed. A big farming district will be thus brought into direct touch with the consumer.

A DISCRIMINATING PLAGUE. In a report that will be gladly read by the whole nation, the public health service of New Orleans announces the practical banishment of bubonic plague from that city. Twenty-five persons contracted the dread disease and six died, but there are now no cases of human infection, though among the greatly reduced rat population infection still exists, so that the plague has not been entirely exterminated as yet. The authorities have the danger well in hand, however, and visitors especially need feel no alarm.

HUMAN ARBORICULTURE IN CHICAGO. If Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of Chicago's schools, has her way the study of peace will be a part of the regular curriculum, racial analysis being a feature of the course, which was first proposed by the Chicago Principals' Club, the object being to combat any tendency toward unneutral militarism among the young. The importance of early shaping a city's "twigs" is seen in a report presented to the city council declaring that Chicago leads in crime, 1913 showing 262 murders, 1,022 assaults and 1,041 burglaries as against 131, 928 and 1,755 respectively in New York. Total arrests on all charges, most of them minor, was 109,764; 11,203 for felonies. It costs Chicago $8,000,000 annually to maintain its courts and jails. A large percentage of those arrested are later discharged as innocent, a circumstance that the report professes inability to explain.

CONSTANTINOPLE JEWS SUFFER BY FIRE. On the night of September 22 a fire destroyed eight hundred Jewish homes situated on the Golden Horn inlet on the northern side of Constantinople, 3,000 Jews being placed in great distress which the authorities are relieving; the American Ambassador, Henry Morgenthau, helping in the organization of relief.

GUNS THAT SHOOT ONLY ONE WAY. The State Department has promulgated rules for the guidance of merchant vessels entering and leaving United States ports, who do not want to be blown out of the water by our indignantly neutral navy. The outstanding feature of the official order is the provision that such vessels may be duly armed for defense only; their guns must not open up an attack upon other vessels. To insure this one-sided but reasonable arrangement the ship's guns must not exceed six inches calibre; must with small arms be few in number and never mounted forward; ammunition must be small in quantity, crew and officers the same as before war was declared, and the general intentions of the ship must be apparent to our port officials.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS TO MARCH FOR PEACE. It was planned to have the annual Sunday School parade in Philadelphia, September 26, in which 125,000 officers, teachers and scholars would take part, display banners bearing the motto, "Marching for the Prince of Peace," and also carry a new flag called the peace flag as a message to Europe; this flag shows a gold gross diagonally on a white ground, flanked by the Stars and Stripes and the Sunday School flag.

THE UNDER-SEA MENACE. The dreams of naval experts came true on September 22, when a flotilla of five German submarines attacked and sank three British cruisers in the North Sea. The cruisers were of 10,000 tons burden and carried about 2,300 men in all. The loss of life was given as 1,133, the survivors being picked up by British destroyers, which arrived on the scene a few hours after the disaster. Until this engagement the value of submarines remained doubtful. Earlier in the war a British cruiser destroyed a German submarine which had attacked her. The engagement in the North Sea demonstrated the terrific power these inexpensive craft possess to destroy battleships of the first class costing millions, for the approach of the submarines and the discharge of their torpedoes would have been the same had dreadnoughts been their objective. It is the ability of these fighters to conceal their movements almost entirely, that may make the German squadron of about 70 submarines and torpedo boats a formidable power against England's battleship fleets, even though the German fleet remains bottled up. England has about 150 submarines and torpedo boats, but as matters stand can for the present find no effective use for them. She has, however, over 200 torpedo boat destroyers as against Germany's 150. The British guns were able to sink two of the five submarines before the cruisers went down.

TAKING CARE OF THE PENNIES. The post office savings bank is a penny affair, in the estimation of those who know nothing about it. The system is now three years old, and 9,653 post offices have savings depository facilities and have on deposit very nearly $50,000,000. The latest report of the Post Office Department puts New York State in the lead, with $7,593,000 deposited, Ohio next with $3,671,000, and Hawaii last, with $19,395.

AMERICAN GUNBOATS 2,000 MILES INLAND. The gunboats Palos and Monocacy are about to start from Hankow, China, which is 600 miles up the Yangtse River, on a trip to the frontier of Tibet, 1,400 miles farther inland, to gather hydrographic and topographic data, the Stars and Stripes never before having been where the two small craft will g These venturesome boats are under 200 tons and have a dra of two feet five inches; they were built by the government Mare Island, Cal., taken apart, shipped to Shanghai and the reassembled and commissioned. ALL TO DO OVER AGAIN I MEXICO. A serious break betwee Gen. Carranza and Gen. Villa was re ported from Mexico, September 28 Villa declaring he no longer recognizes Carranza as first chie of the Constitutionalists, and refusing to be represented at th national convention in Mexico City, October 1. Long represse enmity between the two men burst all caution when Villa placed under arrest the Constitutionalist commander, Gen Alvaro Obregon, who visited Chihuahua City for a conference Carranza has discontinued the service of railways available fo transportation of rebel troops. The Constitutionalists ar understood to have an army of over 50,000. Villa's revol promises to be fruitful of trouble for the new régime i Mexico. He has unquestionably a certain popularity with th people. The ex-bandit has established headquarters at Chihua hua and is in practical control of northern Mexico, where h may be able to hold out indefinitely. His fighting force i estimated at anywhere from twelve to forty thousand. There is just a possibility of a compromise being reached; but i would not be at all surprising to find Villa attempting t establish an independent government in the North, in which case the whole country might again be divided up into warring factions.

DIPLOMATS INCUR PRESIDENTIAL DISPLEASURE. It is understood in Washington that the Turkish Ambassador, A. Rustem Bey, is sure to be recalled at the instance of our government because of indiscreet comments on our domestic affairs. Sir Lionel Carden, former British Minister to Mexico, now Minister to Brazil, for similar criticism of our course in Mexico, is expected to be taken to task by his government. On September 23 the President called the attention of Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador at Washington (himself no sphinx), to a published interview with Baron Wilhelm von Schoen of the German Diplomatic service, in which that diplomat declared that intense hatred for the United States exists throughout Japan.

CHRIST IN THE GARDEN

The Garden of Sorrows

By Amos R. Wells

THE English writer, Rev. Paxton Hood, tells of a visit a friend of his paid to a poor woman who was in great trouble, but was ever cheerful. "Your life is full of clouds, Mary," said he. "Yes," she answered, "but then I often find there's comfort in a cloud." "Comfort in a cloud, Mary?" "Yes," she said; "when I am very low and dark I go to the window, and if I see a heavy cloud I think of those precious words, 'A cloud received him out of their sight,' and I look up, and think, Well, that may be the cloud that hides him. And so you see there is comfort in a cloud."

It was for this that our Lord entered Gethsemane, the Garden of Sorrows. He knew that all his followers must enter there, and he would prepare a place for them there as well as in heaven. It is so much easier to get along where Christ has been before!

Entering Gethsemane in this spirit, we soon learn the blessedness of the place. "No flower," wrote Elizabeth Prentiss, "can bloom in paradise that is not transplanted from Gethsemane." Gethsemane is a garden of the plowshare. If a field is never torn up by the sharp shares that destroy all the flowers, uproot all the grasses, and transform beauty to a waste of ugly dirt, the field will never laugh with a harvest.

Volcanic countries are most fertile. I stood in Naples when Vesuvius was in eruption. All around me was a scene of loveliness unsurpassed upon the globe. The lava, poured out of the great fiery mountain, bringing death and devastation with it as at Pompeii and Herculaneum near by, had yet in decomposing made the richest and most fruitful of soils, transforming the region into a paradise. Even before it is decomposed, lava is worked up into many beautiful forms, including a very exquisite glass of extraordinary lightness. When your life is overwhelmed with the lava-flow of a great sorrow, extract a harvest from it. Gethsemane is not a wilderness; it is a garden.

Joseph Roux, the famous French mystic, once wrote: "A whole heaven is contained in a drop of dew, a whole soul within a tear." If this is true of our tears, how much more of Christ's! They mirror the universe of God's love. Mrs. Oliphant beautifully wrote: "Nothing but infinite pity is sufficient for the infinite pathos of human life." And in the tears of Jesus we find infinite pity.

Gethsemane is not only the home of pity, it is a school of prayer. The same Paxton Hood whom I have just quoted was once visiting a dying saint and asked him, "How are you today?" This was the noble answer: "My head is resting on three pillows: Infinite Power, Infinite Love and Infinite Wisdom." While his three weak human friends rested their heads on the unanswering ground, Christ sought those pillows for his great weariness, and he found them, as we may.

Not even he found them at once. The first lesson in the prayer school is perseverance. Dr. Goodell says, "We pray and run away. We do not wait to see if God has not some great gift for us." He reminds us of the comparison of the old Puritan preacher, Manton, who said that our prayers are like silly boys who knock at a door and then take to their heels without waiting for some one to answer the knock; but a man that has business will knock and knock again, till he gets an answer.

The heart of Gethsemane is in the words, "Not what I will, but what thou wilt." A sea-captain's child was in the cabin, journeying through her first storm at sea. She woke up with a start in the midst of the turmoil, and cried in alarm, "Where's father?" The answer came, "On deck, watching the storm." "Then I'll go to sleep," said the trusting child; and she did.

Mrs. Wilcox sings:

> God pity those who cannot say,
> "Not mine, but thine"; who only pray
> "Let this cup pass," and cannot see
> The purpose in Gethsemane.

The sleepy disciples did not see it then, but they came later to see it. Christ was wonderfully patient with their slowness and their lack of sympathy, and he will be as patient with ours. All he asks is that we follow him into Gethsemane as close as we can, and learn as fast as we can the Gethsemane lessons.

THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, October 18, 1914. In the Garden of Gethsemane. Mark 14: 32-42. GOLDEN TEXT: "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." Matt. 26: 41.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

All our watching and praying may not avail to ward off experiences of trial, sorrow and suffering; but they will prevent these bitter experiences from becoming occasions of failure and remorse. There are certain cups that may not pass from us. They have to be drunk to the dregs. Such is our Father's ordination. But if we watch and pray, they become sweet, because they contain our Father's will; and we become strong, as though an angel had ministered to us of his immortal strength. So our Lord found it, and so we shall find it. The sentry dares not sleep, when the night is dark and the foe is creeping up the slope. But if we fail in the agony of the clash, we are not disowned or dismissed the service. He who has been tempted in all points as we are—our faithful and merciful High Priest—makes excuse, knowing full well that we have miscalculated our powers, that out of defeat we shall learn victory, and that our anguish will be the strait gate of our entrance into perfected and radiant blessedness.

The Agony of Christ

By Arthur H. Howland

BEFORE attempting either to teach or recite this lesson study the accounts of Christ's experience in Gethsemane in all three of the Synoptic Gospels. Note carefully the wording of the various descriptions of what Jesus went through during this bitter hour, and try to conceive what his agony was like, remembering that they are not words about a weakling or a coward, but the stanchest, bravest soul that ever lived.

Think of the wildest, cruelest pain you have ever suffered, pain that made you writhe and sweat, pain that gripped your heart and racked your brain and tortured your soul, pain that sickened and choked you until it seemed that death itself was touching your throat, pain that made the sunlight fade from the earth if it was day, or blotted out the stars if it was night—then know that all this, multiplied infinitely, fails to reach the measure of the agony of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane.

What was the nature and cause of his suffering we shall probably never know, just as we shall never know its depths. There was some mysterious connection between that grief and the sins of the world, your sin and mine. In some incomprehensible way he began to bear there what he finished bearing later upon the cross, the real woes which are the fruit of the world's sin. Paul declares that he was made "a curse" for us. (Gal. 3: 13). He says again: "God made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin." (II Cor. 5: 21). Facts like these were in that strange cry he uttered from the cross: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Facts like these, not any shrinking from mere death or from physical pain, made him writhe in the Garden with the agonizing plea: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me."

Even mature Christians are apt to be sorely tried and puzzled at times by the baffling question why there is so much pain in the world. Not necessarily their own sufferings, but the sufferings of all people perplex and dismay them. What does it mean? Why is it allowed? The answer is Gethsemane—and Calvary. It seems to be the only way certain things are gotten.* We must pay the price; so must nature; so must the human race. So must God. We see him beginning to pay the price—there in the Garden and later on the cross. Knowing, as we do, who Jesus was, we know that his sufferings were the sufferings of God. Now we can begin to guess the measureless depths and heights and breadths and lengths of his sympathy and pity, which mean that greatest, that ultimate fact in the universe—HIS LOVE.

*The "Sky Pilot," in Ralph Connor's sweet story, told Gwen of the cañon flowers that could only grow because the Master of the Prairie had smitten the Prairie with a furious storm, tearing a great gash in its breast. Only here, protected from the winds, could the seeds of the sweetest flowers take root and come to blossom. There are sweetnesses and charms and beauties of character that can come only by the bearing of bitter griefs.

Echoes from the Holy Land

GARDENS in Palestine are found mainly in the environs of the larger towns and owe their existence to springs and fountains whose precious waters give life to the fruits and flowers, orchards, parks and pleasure grounds which enter into the Oriental conception of Paradise. Where no running stream exists they depend for life upon capacious cisterns which "drink water from the rain of heaven." They are always carefully enclosed and protected by hedges, walls and ditches, and the traveler is surprised amid the heat and glare of the Syrian sun to enter their pleasant pathways and find retired and shady nooks under embowering greenery. Their secluded recesses have always been a favorite resort for purposes of devotion. They are often the gathering place of families and friends and the tokens of peace and security is when a man may sit in safety under his own vine and figtree.

The plots are usually small, carefully hedged and guarded by gates; and almost everywhere have their own local names which become endeared to families by centuries of family ownership.

Gethsemane was certainly the garden of a friend of Christ and his disciples, where they often met in safe seclusion and rest. Its name was fixed most probably by the existence of an olive press which almost insensibly connects itself with the crushing and grinding of that pure spirit in the agony of that supreme hour.

The traditional Garden of Gethsemane at Jerusalem is reached in a few minutes from St. Stephen's gate by walking into the valley and across the bridge that spans the Kidron. It is still a quiet and secluded spot. A stone wall encloses the irregular square of seventy paces, inside of which are eighty very ancient olive trees and a well of water. It belongs to the Franciscans and has been reverenced since the fourth century. Some cling fondly to the idea that these ancient and gnarled trunks were listeners to the agonizing cries of the Saviour on that fateful night. Others doubt the accuracy of the tradition which locates Gethsemane too near the city, but all agree that the real spot cannot have been many feet away from this site of most ancient tradition.

For us Gethsemane is in the heart of the race—the heart of human history—love inexpressible, guiltless, divine, atoning for human worthlessness and sin.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LEADERSHIP TRAINING

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Assistant Superintendent

I. For study with class, one of the following books on Sunday School Organization: The Efficient Sunday School (Cope), The Organized Sunday School (Axtell), The Graded Sunday School (Meyer), The Sunday School at Work (Faris).

II. For specialization study at home, one of the following books relating to Methods of Administration: Modern Methods in Sunday School Work (Mead), The Superintendent and His Work (Brown), How to Conduct the Sunday School (Lawrance), Ways of Working (Schauffler).

III. Method Material.

The assistant superintendent should have a distinct place and recognized duties. Many assistants are mere figureheads or policemen to keep restless boys repressed. The real assistant will be hands and eyes and feet for the superintendent, while the latter is upon the platform. He is the field officer keeping the ranks in line with the general plan.

In the larger school there may easily be several assistants, each charged with special service as in any well ordered business. And there may be assistant superintendents who are superintendents of departments. But in the small and average school, there is but one assistant superintendent, who is charged with a number of different tasks. These tasks are here suggested.

1. He creates atmosphere. This he does by being on hand a half hour before the session to shake hands with teachers and scholars as they enter, welcome the stranger and greet the new scholar. His smile, his word of inquiry, of good cheer and encouragement is the oil that makes for the smooth running of the machinery.

2. He watches ventilation. Many a church and school session, and the spiritual impression of a carefully wrought-out program, is spoiled by insufficient or bad ventilation. The devil and the sexton are often in league to neutralize the Gospel. And the time to start the proper ventilation of a room is not in the midst of the session, but an hour before it. If the school immediately succeeds the church session the assistant superintendent should see that air is admitted during the change and while the school is standing during the opening hymn. The Sunday school should take a few lessons from the public school in this matter of change of air for school efficiency.

2. He arranges preliminaries. He will organize the boys as helpers to see that song books, Bibles, hymn and announcement board, and chairs are in place in advance of the session. These boys may be designated with a helper's badge.

4. Assignment of scholars. The first impression upon a new customer is frequently lasting. It is good business for the kingdom to make the right first touch upon the new scholar's life. The assistant superintendent can do this by his welcome, his introduction of the scholar to the secretary, for registration, and the scholar's introduction to the class. The scholar will be told by the assistant that "if the goods are not satisfactory," if the class is not congenial, a change will be made upon application. This will frequently save the loss of a customer.

Questions and Answers

J. S., Wilmington, Mass. 1. Did Christ in the flesh on the cross bear the sins of the whole world, and if necessary believe that he was cut off and lost from God? 2. Can we have assurance of eternal life? 3. Can we personally be supposed to know that we are forgiven, or are we only to believe and trust the promises? 4. What is understood by finding rest? 5. Can we find it in other ways, besides those of prayer or repeating scripture passages?

1. Yes, undoubtedly. That is precisely the gospel message. 2. Again yes.

> My hope is built on nothing less > Than Jesus' blood and righteousness.

3. That is wide from that as we continue to trust Christ we shall have further "assurance." That is as we find the promises true, as they bring us peace and hope, as we grow more acquainted with him, our confidence grows greater. Every day that he keeps us strengthens the evidence that he will continue to keep us. 4. We get more faith in the ways already touched upon and also by earnest and constant work for the Master. So we use it to help others in his name and as we observe how his grace is sufficient for them as well as for ourselves our faith grows brighter and firmer. 4. Various schools of theology differ about this doctrine of "assurance." Some saints and scholars are so impressed with the fruitless and vagaries of the human mind that they cannot understand how a human being can be sure of certain things relating to the Infinite and divine. Others, and these are the many, the people, find by most Protestant terms with their "sure word and as assurance." Hope," "trusting," "knowledge" are favorite New Testament words. The apostles were absolutely sure that Christ had redeemed them and was their friend. Many other souls have had and many still possess this same experience. They know and like Gregory Thaw put it "they would never call it self-love could that ever save. They set out to accomplish that." One thing I know, that whereas I was blind now I see." They knew they were to endure and depend on God, now they knew they love and trust him. They began by believing the promises because others had found them true, now they believe them because they have found them true. Study II Tim. 1: 12; I John 2: 3, 5; 3: 14, 19, 24; 4: 13, 16; 5: 13, 14, 15, 19; Rom. 8: 16, and 5. Many things would be an evidence of a spiritual kind, or at least of a desire for spiritual life, but the question is, Satan: "Do we love [illegible]" That is the one test.

Q. E. F., Akron, Ohio. What is meant by "the testimony of Jesus" in Rev. xix: 10? Have all Christians this testimony? What is meant by prophesying in this case? Does it seem to imply an office, as to Daniel [illegible] verse?

The "testimony of Jesus" means as it is used elsewhere in the Revelation, the testimony of the Christian to Jesus as shown forth in his witness. For Jesus, the glorified as he who said what Jesus in this world he was none the less the man Jesus. All Christians should [illegible] have this testimony. They should be able to state, humbly, simply, [illegible] what Christ has been to them and what he means to them. Study to be workers on the principle laid down in Christian Science and Angels, or "The Life of Emphasis." C. P. B., Guelph, Ia. What concessions did Servia, Montenegro and Bulgaria obtain from Turkey in the late Balkan War?

The first treaty (May 30, 1913) between the Allies (Servia, Bulgaria, Montenegro and Greece) and Turkey gave the former all Turkey in Europe west of a line drawn between Enos on the Ægean Sea and Midia on the Black Sea, leaving the future of Albania in the hands of the Powers. A Friend, Missouri. It is very clear from your letter that you are being needlessly tormented by doubts and self-accusations which come from your own imaginings or from the tempter, rather than from the Holy Spirit. It may be very comforting to know that there are many cases like yours where sincere soul's have suffered great torment because of similar accusations and fears. Do you not see in the first place, that these feelings cannot be responses from God because if they were they would be definite and emphatic. When God accuses us of anything we know exactly what he means. He does not torment and perplex us by talking in riddles and in enigmas. Jesus said: "My sheep know my voice." It is one of the offices of the Holy Spirit to "convict," for conviction of sin is such a definite thing that we know exactly where and just what the wrong is. What God requires in the matter of sin we will see if we turn from [illegible] to him. Remember that what [illegible] is not necessarily that you do or [illegible] but what God has done in the gift of his Son and what he has promised in his Word. On that ground God can forgive us the moment we repent, no matter whether or not we feel it. Your trouble God doubts arise if you [illegible] and [illegible] you in the way. Does the example of Hezekiah which [illegible] to you? He was expressing the sincere desire of his heart in his sickness and God [illegible] him. Please write [illegible] I cannot recommend the Bible from [illegible] but I can promise them [illegible] as we look to God for [illegible]. [illegible] whether it is necessary for the [illegible] before you can receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. Acts 2: 39. Read the wonderful promises for cleansing and for the filling of the Holy Spirit, Ezek. 36: 25-27; Zech. 13: 1; II Cor. 7: 1; Rom. 6 (the whole chapter); Heb. 10: 1-23; I Thess. 5: 23-24; and Heb. 13: 20-21. Take your stand firmly upon these and other promises, believe that God meant them for you, and refuse any longer to live in fear and distress. He is abundantly able to save and will save "to the uttermost."

A. W. W., Muscatine, Iowa. There is a question upon which our Sunday school class has debated three times: "Was there any real virtue in the water of the Pool of Siloam, or was it a superstition?" The Revised Version does not mention the angel troubling the water.

In the account in John's Gospel, fifth chapter, it is made clear that there was a popular belief that the pool possessed certain healing qualities at the time of the "moving" (or inflow) of the waters from the hidden springs. This may or may not have been based on superstition or on some tradition concerning the pool. It should be noted, however, that Jesus (in John 5: 6-8) said nothing about any wonderful virtue in the waters of the pool; if there was a tradition or superstition on the subject, he simply set it aside and cured the infirm sufferer where he lay. In the case of the blind beggar at the pool of Siloam (John, 9th chapter) there is frequently a misconception in the mind of the reader. Jesus did not tell the blind man to wash "in" the pool, but having anointed his eyes with clay and spittle, directed him to wash "at" the pool—to cleanse his eyes of the moistened clay with which, under the divine touch, the miracle of restoring his sight was accomplished.

Mrs. J. R., Hanover, Pa. 1. George Washington is credited with the authorship of the words: "That little spark of celestial fire, called conscience." 2. The sentence you quote is not in the Bible.

A. M. S., Sandpoint, Idaho, writes in reference to a recent Mail-Bag paragraph: "The Edda is not a Bible and is not so considered by the Scandinavian people. It is nothing more nor less than fairy tales (folk-lore). Norway stands high in education among the nations of the world."

S. D. A., Caldfield, N. Y. According to the best Bible scholars, Manasseh's reign began B.C. 697 and ended B.C. 642—fifty-five years. His birth is fixed at B.C. 709, twelve years before he ascended the throne. His reign was longer than that of any other monarch of the house of David.

I. E. B., Gatto, W. Va. Metaphysics and psychology are closely allied, yet there is a distinction. Metaphysics is the science of first principles of being and of knowledge, the reasoned doctrine of the essential nature of fundamental relations of all that is real. In short, it is an application of the principles of philosophy to the principles of any particular science. Psychology is the science of mind and soul that treats inductively of the phenomena of human consciousness and of the nature and relations of the subjects of them. It is simply philosophy of the mind.

Mrs. C. L. T., Auburn, Mass. It would be very unusual for a church to have an application for letters of recommendation to another church, from a former member who had moved away over twenty years before, and had never attended in all that time. There are many changes in twenty years, and we can hardly conceive of any combination of circumstances that would justify granting such an application. If the absentee wishes to join another church, he can make confession of faith and so become a member in good standing again.

Thousands of Domestic Science Students are being taught the advantages of Crisco

Domestic Science is making a nation of good cooks. The coming generation of housekeepers will start their practical experience in home-cookery with Crisco.

Prominent Domestic Science institutions use Crisco. They judge by analysis; they reject or accept a food product only after having scientifically tested it for purity and for what it will do.

CRISCO
For Frying · For Shortening
For Cake Making

Wherever, in fact, Domestic Science is taught—in public school, college, or cooking class, Crisco is almost certain to be used. The fact that the heads of these institutions, these men and women who make cooking their life business use Crisco, is a strong suggestion that Crisco should replace the older cooking fats in your own kitchen, for frying, shortening and cake making.

Beautiful cloth-bound book of new recipes and a "Calendar of Dinners" for five 2-cent stamps!

This handsome book by Marion Harris Neil gives 615 excellent tested recipes. Also contains a "Calendar of Dinners"—a dinner menu for every day in the year. The Calendar tells what, the recipes tell how. Book also contains cookery hints and the interesting story of Crisco's development. Bound in blue and gold cloth. To those answering this advertisement it will be sent for five 2-cent stamps. Address Dept. S-10, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, Ohio.

"You gave orders for the necessary arrangements?" Herrin inquired.

"Yes."

Anderson, who was the son of the largest stockholder, and who owed his position, which was a rather superfluous one, to the relationship, stirred uneasily in his comfortable chair. He had the feeling that something out of the ordinary was about to happen, and he disliked the unusual. Until his present position, he had never come in contact with what he termed the "common class," and their ignorance, he acknowledged, irritated him. The presence of Lige in the office annoyed him. He wondered impatiently what business he had there anyway. It was decidedly unpleasant, he thought, to have a fellow like this running into the office to announce that his "baby was dead." Anderson resolved to speak to Blake about this custom of laborers running to the office with every little trouble. He was thinking that perhaps he had better walk over to the plant until Herrin was through with this fellow, when Herrin spoke again.

"Is there anything more we can do for you, Lige?" he asked in a much gentler voice than he had at first used.

Blake suddenly pretended deep absorption in his accounts, yet paused, with uplifted pen, for the answer. He, too, had the feeling that something not altogether pleasing was about to occur, and mentally abused himself for having failed to mention the matter of the baby's demise to Herrin, for the furnace town was small and the superintendent had rather prided himself on keeping in touch with the daily happenings, especially those concerning his workmen. Yet it was unusual for one of the men to come to the office except on important matters, and Blake found himself listening intently, almost anxiously, for the reply to Herrin's questioning.

"It's too late to do anything that'll count, Mister Her'in."

The dull note of despair in Lige's voice seemed to lend an added chill to the already gloomy atmosphere of the room that had been so bright a few moments previous. The three listeners moved restlessly, as by a common impulse, and Anderson decided he would certainly go in for a moment if the interview was prolonged.

Lige, innocent of the discomfort he was causing, went on in the same hopeless voice.

"I come to see," he said, "if there ain't places where folks can get flow'rs in the winter time; I thought you orta know if they was sech places, Mister Her'in, an' if you can get me jest two or three little blossoms fer my dead baby I'll work fer'm a month if need be."

There was a moment's tense silence. And when Herrin answered, there was a strained, unnatural quality in his voice.

"Yes, there are places, Lige," he said, shading his eyes—perhaps from the too bright glare of the fire—"where flowers grow the year round. I'll—get them—for you. Anything else?"

Blake stared at the figures on his ledger, wondering at their odd dimness, and Anderson gazed at Lige as if he thought he had discovered a new species. It was simply astonishing—incredible. Surely his ears had deceived him—that this stooped, coarse-featured day-laborer with great toil-hardened hands hanging awkwardly at his side for a moment, then turning the makeshift hat, should want flowers to put in a dead baby's hands. Flowers! when in all probability he wasn't earning enough to buy plentiful meat and bread. Anderson had quite forgotten his intention of leaving the office by this time. He leaned forward eagerly, gripping the sides of his chair unconsciously, as he waited to hear what more this strange creature might ask.

"No," Lige was saying, "there ain't nothin' else you can do fer my baby, Mister Her'in, exceptin' the flow'rs. Seemed like Aily couldn't bear it 'ithout some kind o' posies—she was takin' some old faded-like, store-bought flow'rs off'n her hat to put in the baby's hands, when I left, an' seemed like I jest couldn't stand for it to have them kind."

Herrin moved uneasily. He wished Lige would go. The subject was certainly far from a cheerful one, and he was pondering on some kind way of dismissing him, when Lige's next few sentences sent the hot, surprised blood to his face.

"I'll be mighty thankful fer yore kindness, an' I'm a hopin' Aily 'll feel the same. You see, Mister Her'in, Aily thinks if we'd a lived in a—a sort of warm-like house — the — baby wouldn't a died jest now."

A smothered exclamation came from Blake, and Herrin half rose. Only Anderson appeared undisturbed, as Lige, looking beyond them, his face set and furrowed, continued with unconscious pathos:

"I'm a tryin' to believe myself it would a happened jest the same if we'd a bin som'ers else, but it might be I jest want to think that way so's the hurt won't be any wors'n it is, and if Aily's p'int of view is right, Mister Her'in, seems like to me you air the one who orta know about it. I told Aily maybe you ain't never bin inside them little houses down there by the dump where a lot of us fellers live b'cause they ain't no other place fer us.

"No — I haven't — Lige," Herrin slowly admitted. "What about them?"

Lige was visibly embarrassed and his expression was pitiable.

"They ain't—much—hou-ses at all, Mister Her'in," he stammered. Jest kind'r stalls, where we men folks git our feed an' sleep. I mean they ain't ve'y—ve'y—"

Lige paused as if searching for a word that would not give offense.

"Go on," Herrin encouraged.

"You see, they ain't so bad fer us men, Mister Her'in—is what I mean, but the wimmen and children are there all the time and they ain't no way of keepin' warm when it's bad, fer the snow and rain comes in through the cracks in the wall and the wind blows up through the floor where the boards don't come nigh t'gether. W'y, Mister Her'in, sometimes when I see my little fellers a-shiverin' on a old bed quilt b'fore the fire, I jest feel like Aily did the time she was a-wishin' she might die b'fore ernother one was borned. I don't let on to Aily like I see how bad it is, fer there don't seem any way of changin' things much fer a po're man. But I get to thinkin' sometimes if men like you, Mister Her'in, and Mister Anders'n and Mister Blake here, could know us workin' fellers a little better, you might try to get big comp'nys like this to give'm a little better houses to live in.

"Aily told me how nice an' warm it air up to yore place, Mister Her'in," Lige continued, uninterrupted. "She was ther' once't to carry home some washin' and she said as how it was the purtiest place she ever seen, with its carpets an' easy-like cha'rs. But I couldn't help thinkin' most of how warm she said it was—they ain't much danger of yore little fellers a-gettin' the croup, Mister Her'in, and I'm shore glad fer you b'cause it's pow'rful hard when one is took so—so—sudden like."

There was a break in Lige's voice and Herrin left off staring at the fire and looked at Blake.

"Have you been in those places?" he interrupted in rather husky tones. "Surely, they can't be so bad as Lige thinks."

"Bad! they're worse! Just rat holes," snapped Blake, in a vain effort to speak naturally.

Anderson, with a peculiar expression, motioned them to silence. "The—the children have—plenty of—er—warm clothing, haven't they, Lige?" he questioned.

A flush crept up through the pallor of Lige's face.

"I—I—do the best I can fer'm, Mister Anders'n," he defended. "Aily said onc't though, that all I pervided was changin' rags," he acknowledged sorrowfully. "I'm a hopin'," he continued, "to do better'n that sence I got the engine job, and me and Aily's bin plannin' mayby we could save up and buy us a little place sometime. I —I guess it's likely you don't know much erbout po're folks, Mister Anderson, and you won't see, I reck'n, why we jest—sort o' live fr'm hand to mouth. It ain't because we don't work, but it jest seems mighty hard to git a start if you air born po're and stay on amongst pore folks. You feel like you oughta help'm, and you ain't learned how to do nothin' that'll pay much, and ain't got no book larnin' to help you climb anywhere, and when you git mar'ed and the little fellers start to comin', and the doctor has to be paid fer and eatin' and rent, they ain't much left fer clo's. I—I use'to think if ther' warn't so many of 'm I might do better by the others, but—but sence—sence the baby's bin took—seems like I'd give anything in the world, if I had it, to be free fr'm ever havin' such a thought."

Lige paused, drawing his frayed sleeve across his eyes, and then, as if unable to go on, without another word went slowly from the room—fumbling the latch through a blur of tears.

A bright blaze flared in the grate of the little newly finished house which had been built for the company doctor's office. The walls were neatly papered, and before the fire, in lieu of a rug, lay a piece of bright carpeting. A cushioned rocker was drawn invitingly to one corner of the hearth, and opposite, a man's somewhat worn arm chair. There were a couple of children's chairs, also worn, but comfortable looking.

Two beds stood in the back of the room, and folded across the foot of each, lay, apparently, a new comforter and warm-looking blankets, and piled neatly on a chair close by were a heap of children's new underclothing and slightly worn little dresses, shoes and stockings and other garments for little ones.

The room had a peculiar air of expectancy, and presently the door opened from without, and the superintendent of the Warner Coal and Iron Company came in, followed by Aily and Lige, who paused, seemingly confused, just inside.

"Come to the fire," Herrin invited kindly. "I had your things moved over here where it will be a little more comfortable. The rent will be just the same," he continued, ignoring their bewilderment, "and these few extra things here were sent over by Mr. Anderson and Blake, and—and Mrs. Herrin. Mrs. Rogers will bring the children over right away," he concluded lamely.

Herrin turned to leave, but Lige detained him with a respectful touch. "We—we—thank you—Mister Her-'in," he said chokingly, "even if—we cain't say much just now."

"That's all right, Lige." Herrin's voice wasn't quite steady, and giving Lige's big, rough hand a genuine brotherly grip, he was gone, leaving the two looking at each other with an expression where grief and wonder struggled.

Aily was the first to speak:

"Ain't them comfort'ble-like cha'rs, Lige?" she said. "I bet the—children'll be tickled with them little 'ns." Her voice had a ring of grief and weariness, but a dawning interest was in her glance about the room. "W'y—look on the bed!" she continued, discovering the new blankets and the

The only way to be certain you are getting Skinner's Satin

"Look for the name in the selvage"

Manufacturers of suits, cloaks and furs know that Skinner's Satin is one of the strongest recommendations a garment can have. They are careful, therefore, to leave some of the Skinner selvage in every garment they line with

Skinner's Satin

YOU, the purchaser, thus have absolute proof that the lining is the genuine Skinner's Satin and n t some worthless adulterated satin that will soon go to pieces.

Look for the name in the selvage. The salesclerk will gladly open up a few stitches of the lining for you.

Skinner's Satin is guaranteed to wear two seasons. If it does not, send the garment to any of our stores and we will reline it free of expense.

WORKABLE UNION IDEA

THE Urbandale district in a growing quarter of Des Moines, Iowa, has grown into a spirit of civic, educational and social co-operation by the necessity of mutual dependence. Its territory covers several square miles. When the churches of the city saw it was growing rapidly, each wanted to start a mission there and develop its own denominational interests. But the Urbandale people, who had learned by experience through co-operation that they could unite on other things, said: "Why not have a united church in our community and worship and work together?"

Of course the old question of denominational divisions popped up, as it ever does. But the Christian people of Urbandale really wanted to federate in religion if possible, so after many conferences they decided to build a tabernacle, hold union evangelization services and if possible organize a union or federal church. This meeting resulted in an organization of 130 members, made up of all the strongest denominations in Des Moines, and the raising of $8,000 for a new church house.

It is called the "Urbandale Federated Church" and the double membership idea is unique. The leaders insist that those who come into this church shall continue to maintain membership in their respective downtown churches. If Baptists, they remain Baptists; if Presbyterian, they remain Presbyterian; and so on all the way round the denominational circle. New converts, after a confession of their faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour, are first received into the denominational church of their choice in the city, and then received into the Urbandale Federated Church. If the convert has no denominational choice, he is first baptized by any ordained Protestant minister he may choose, and is then received into full fellowship, having no other affiliation but that of the Federated Church.

This new organization has a communion service on the first Sunday of each month. They refrain from participation, as a church, in all social activities that would do violence to the teachings of any church represented. They propose to contribute to missions, and will gather funds for that purpose, but will disburse such funds to some one of the missionary activities that is carried on by a federation of the different denominations.

This Federated Church is composed of eleven different Protestant denominations, and its official board has fifteen men on it, representing six leading denominations of Des Moines.

This plan of maintaining a dual membership seems to embody the practical solution of the problem of co-operation in such communities. The principle is a very simple one and no doubt will work where people are prepared for it. R. S. T. WILLIS.

A LABOR BISHOP

A "MAN greatly beloved" has been unexpectedly removed from the field of earth's activities. Bishop McIntyre had won the rare distinction of being loved and trusted by the church, and also loved and trusted by the workingmen.

Robert McIntyre was indeed a bishop; but he always felt himself to be also a workingman. In his study he kept in a prominent place an old trowel with which he had in earlier days earned his living as a bricklayer. He entered the Methodist ministry in 1875, and twenty-three years later, 1908, was elected bishop.

We quote, with permission from The Christian Advocate, his last published poem.

THE NAZARETH SHOP

By Bishop Robert McIntyre

I

I WISH I had been His apprentice, to see him each morning at seven,
As he tossed his gray tunic far from him, the Master of earth and of heaven.
When he lifted the lid of his work chest and opened his carpenter's kit
And looked at his chisels and augers, and took the bright tools out of it
While he gazed at the rising sun tinting the dew on the opening flowers
And smiled as he thought of his Father, whose love floods this planet of ours.
When he fastened his apron about him, and put on his workingman's cap,
And grasped the smooth haft of his hammer, to give the bent woodwork a tap,
Saying, "Lad, let us finish this ox yoke. The farmer must put in his crop."
O, I wish I had been his apprentice, and worked in the Nazareth shop.

II

SOME wish they had been on Mount Tabor, to hearken unto his high speech
When the quick and the dead were beside him, he holding communion with each.
Some wish they had heard the soft accents that stilled the wee children's alarms,
When he won the sweet babes from their mothers and folded them fast in his arms.
Some wish they had stood by the Jordan when holy John greeted him there
And seen the white dove of the Spirit fly down o'er the path of his prayer.
Some wish they had seen our Redeemer when into the basin he poured
The water, and, girt with a towel, the servant of all was the Lord.
But for me, if I had the choosing, O this would them all overtop,
To work all day steady beside him, of old in the Nazareth shop.

III

THESE heavenly wonders would fright me, I cannot approach to them yet,
But, O, to have seen him, when toiling, his forehead all jeweled with sweat.
To hear him say softly, "My helper, now bring me the level and rule."
To have him bend over and teach me the use of each artisan's tool.
To hear him say, "This is a sheep gate, to keep in the wandering flock,"
Or "This is a stout oaken house sill. I hope it will rest on a rock."
And sometimes his mother might bring us our meal in the midsummer heat,
Outspread it so simply before us, and bid us to sit down and eat.
Then with both of us silent before him, the blessed Messiah would stop
To say grace, and a tremulous glory would fill all the Nazareth shop.

WATERMANS IDEAL FOUNTAIN PEN

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

is the one with

Many Advantages

The trade-mark Waterman's Ideal means a great deal to writing convenience, and writing convenience means a great deal to you.

Safety Type for Ladies — The Clip-Cap Prevents Loss

THE advantages in Waterman's Ideals started the world using fountain pens. The advantages increase with the popularity of the pen. The first advantage is to carry ink safely in your pocket ready for immediate use. You write without the dip. Mussy inkwells and scratchy steel pens are discarded. The patented Spoon Feed is the advantage feature that assures proper ink flow in Waterman's Ideals and prevents inky fingers and blots. The Gold Pens are an artful advantage. They are strong. They write smoothly; are of every degree, from finest to coarsest. Hard iridium tips make them last for years. The Clip-Cap advantage prevents loss of pen from pocket or rolling off the desk.

Waterman's Ideal is the cheapest pen.

Every pen stamped Waterman's Ideal is guaranteed to give satisfaction. Gold points furnished to suit every hand. Avoid substitutes. Illustrated booklet on request

5. Substitute teachers. To arrange for the class of the absent teacher is one of the chief functions of the assistant. Those absences occur in every school through sickness, indifference, visits out of town, etc. They cannot always be anticipated and usually the superintendent is not advised of such absence in time for arrangement before the session. The following are some successful plans that have been used to cure the substitute difficulty.

(a) In a Southern seminary school each class had both a regular and an assistant teacher, the assistant teacher to be notified by the regular in case of absence, or if this was impossible, by the assistant superintendent in the school session.

(b) Many members of the church and older members of the school will be willing to serve in a once-a-month substitute list to hold themselves in readiness for service as needed, but not more often than once a month. Frequently these substitutes become effective regular teachers after they have had a taste of the work.

(c) Bible classes frequently will delegate a certain number of the class to be ready if needed for substitute service, say one or two or three members, but no member to be asked more frequently than once every one or two months.

5. Promoting co-operation of scholars in session. The assistant superintendent will first see that the classes face the platform, that singing books are provided for all scholars, that Bibles or lesson papers or both are in their hands at the right moment, and will promote an esprit de corps by a smile, a word of encouragement, a compliment when deserved. Scowling and scolding pay poor dividends. The expression of the scholar's energy in hearty singing and a physical change at the right moment should be sanely promoted if we would capture the jewel of the soul, which lies within these physical limits.

7. He will help a discouraged teacher. Often the teacher is having a hard time through the failure to reach the one or two key pupils and is at a nervous tension. The alert, tactful assistant will have his eyes on such a storm center, will "drop in" the class at the opportune moment and by an illustration from life that will relate to the lesson, will capture the scholars' attention, give the teacher a chance to rest for a moment and readjust her plans. The assistant should have several live lesson stories always ready for these emergencies.

8. He protects the teacher. He will see that the teacher is protected during the lesson from interruption by the secretary, by ticket venders, and by visitors. The teacher is entitled to the lesson period sacred from disturbance.

9. He notes weak spots. He will note and report to the superintendent such weak points as an irregular teacher; a scholar who may give trouble that may be cured by a friendly talk by the superintendent or an invitation to the superintendent's house for a social hour; a teacher who needs a special letter of encouragement from the superintendent.

10. He notes promising new material. From the substitute teachers force or young people growing into strength in the later teens, he will gather names for permanent service as teachers or school workers to suggest to the superintendent.

11. Visitors. To visitors the assistant carefully explains the purpose and plans of the school. Special visitors may be introduced to the superintendent. Some literature of the school should be given to visitors and a card of welcome sent them later.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

By Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

—I AM MAKING SOME special study of the subject of teacher training, and very much desire some practical information.

1. How do you actually secure your Sunday school teachers?
2. What provision do you make for training them?
3. What percentage of them avail themselves of the provision made?
4. If some do not avail themselves of it what in your judgment are a few of the principal reasons?
5. What is your Sunday school enrolment?
6. What is your average attendance?
7. What system of lesson helps do you use?

1. We secure the bulk of our teachers from young people of the Senior Department—from 16 to 20 years of age.

2. We put these young people in a teacher training class at 16 for two years' training in Hurlbut's Normal Outlines.

3. Practically all of those starting in the class complete the work, and are ready for teaching service at its conclusion in the Junior or other departments.

4. The privilege and duty of such service may not have been rightly presented. Class ties may prevent some. There are two ways of overcoming this. The one chosen can study the course with the training class without surrendering membership in the old class. We have found a good plan was to make a training class out of those promoted at 16, using their teacher as the teacher of the training class lessons. This preserves the class unity.

5. Our active enrolment is about 2,900; Cradle Roll and Home Department, 400 additional.

6. Our average attendance outside of the summer is close to 1,600.

7. We use the graded lessons as far as the Senior Department.

—HOW WOULD YOU SUGGEST building up the Cradle Roll Department of the Sunday school?

(a) First get as a superintendent, if not a mother, then some girl with a motherly instinct.

(b) Give out enrolment cards, with a place for the baby's birthday, to the members of the school and members of the church, the pastor and superintendent to urge the interest of members in securing names.

(c) Organize a visitation of the neighborhood to secure names of babies and birthdays from homes both Christian and non-Christian.

(d) When names are secured, send a letter acknowledging membership of the baby, or, what is better, call with the certificate of membership. This certificate you can secure from the denominational publishing house or from such Sunday school concerns as Goodenough and Woglom Company, 122 Nassau Street, New York.

(e) Ask for a picture of the baby, and group it with other baby pictures, and hang on the walls of the Beginners' or Primary room.

(f) Keep a roll of the Crandle Roll and have this roll hung up in the primary room, together with a "Heavenly Cradle Roll," the names of babies who have died.

(g) Initiate the new baby by marching with it around the room in the beginners' or primary mothers' march.

(h) Send a birthday remembrance on the baby's birthday—a birthday picture card, a rubber ball—with some message that will touch the mother's heart.

(i) On Christmas and Children's Day be sure the babies are remembered in a special way.

(j) Start a Cradle Roll Mothers' Class and get these mothers to work in securing names of babies from their friends and neighbors.

(k) Plan a campaign for a definite number of names for the Cradle Roll.

One Sunday school issued a call for "250 new Cradle Roll babies by April 5, 1914."

This was printed on the reverse of an enrolment card with the following announcement:

"A silver school pin to each person bringing into membership five new Cradle Roll babies. A sterling pin for ten new members.

"Requirements. Baby must be under three years of age.

"Reverse side (enrolment) must be properly filled in.

"Cradle Roll Class. It is a happy, attractive, restful meeting-place for mothers and babies. Tables for babies to play at, under direction of solicitous and watchful teachers.

"For Mothers. A strong, active mothers' class in sight of the babies. A place to come and enjoy a Sunday afternoon, forming pleasant acquaintances."

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

A practical father taught book-keeping to his sons while they were very young. To interest them in their work, he gave each an allowance of twenty-five cents a week. Saturday evenings, accounts were gone over, and if they balanced, the boys received five cents as a reward. If an account was not correct, five cents was taken away as a penalty. In a few years a larger allowance was given, out of which the children were shown how to purchase their clothing.

House plants are sometimes killed by destructive worms and insects. It is said that half a raw potato stuck into the earth will attract these pests to itself. The potato should be removed occasionally and the worms or insects which cling to it destroyed. Potted plants may be similarly protected by the use of the old-fashioned parlor match. Stick half a dozen matches, sulphur ends downward, into the earth near the plant. The fumes of the sulphur destroy the animal life without injury to the plant.

It is not always convenient to put all the trunks either in the cellar or the attic, yet one does not like to see them standing around occupying valuable space. One resourceful housewife devised the plan of having a hinged shelf, a little larger than the top of the trunk, attached to the side of the wall and supported by two legs in the front. The trunk was slipped under and the shelf could be conveniently raised when occasion demanded. Pretty figured material covered the top of the shelf and formed curtains for the front and sides.

Resinol Soap

improves complexions

Try this easy way to clear your skin: Bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and warm water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the finger-tips. Then wash off with more Resinol Soap and warm water, finishing with a dash of clear cold water to close the pores.

Do this once or twice a day, and you will be astonished how quickly the healing, antiseptic Resinol balsams soothe and cleanse the pores, remove pimples and blackheads, and leave the complexion clear, fresh and velvety. When the skin is in very bad condition, apply a little Resinol Ointment and let it remain on ten minutes before the final washing with Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap costs but twenty-five cents at all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a guest-room size trial cake, write to Dept. 40-G, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

NATIONAL ASSETS

The New Arizona

THERE is a very general belief, and this many of the encyclopedias and gazetteers have encouraged, that the name "Arizona" is composed of the two words "arid" and "zone," but we think this is quite as inaccurate as Horne Tooke's derivation of "Constantinople" from "Constans the Noble." If space permitted, it would be interesting to narrate here the legend of Arizuma as told forty-two years ago to the writer by the Indians of Zuñi and Moqui, and in a different form, but with the name Arizuma retained, by the Coco-Maricopa of the Gila Basin. This legend clearly sets forth that the region now called Arizona was known before the coming of the white man as the country of Arizuma.

Coronado, who explored Arizona in 1539, has left a fairly accurate account of the country and of "The Seven Cities of Cibola," which we now associate with Zuñi and its dependent settlements, but in no place does he speak of the country as a desert, while he narrates that the people were well clad, well housed, and abundantly fed, "with much treasure of gold, silver and turquoises." That the Arizona of old was a fertile, well-populated land is evidenced to-day by the ruins that strew the valleys of the Colorado Chiquito and the upper stretches of the Gila, while acéquias, or irrigating canals, can be still traced across valleys and along mesas from which running water has long since disappeared, indicating recent climatic changes of a violent character.

Arizona promises to rise to greater wealth than when of old the fabled Arizuma ruled over an emerald realm and a prosperous and contented people. Modern enterprise has enlisted modern science in her service, and together they are making a new Arizona. They are building new canals along the valleys and leading the living waters to the hot lands, where spring up the fruits of the tropics and the cereals of the temperate zones. On the ruined dwellings of races dying or vanished, villages and towns are springing up, and schools and Christian churches are taking the place of the ancient estufas, wherein the sacred fires were kept burning in honor of the sun-god.

On Arizona mesas, supposed to be arid a generation ago, over one million sheep are feeding to-day, and eight hundred thousand cattle graze to fatness in the shadows of the giant cactus. Long before the pioneers dreamt of the agricultural possibilities of the new Arizona, the mineral wealth of the territory had been partly explored, but it will be long before it is fully exploited. It was only yesterday that the government woke up to the timber wealth of the territory and stretched out its paternal hand to preserve the fine primitive forests still remaining on the San Francisco and Mogollon ranges.

Uncle Sam's Bulb Farm

WHILE bulb-grown flowers of the lily family are to be found, domestic and wild, in every land in the temperate zone where the moisture is sufficient, Holland has been and is preeminently the country of the tulip, the hyacinth, narcissus and crocus. From Holland our florists receive a large part of their annual supply of bulbs, more than one million dollars being spent last year for these importations. With a proper understanding of the importance of this industry, our Department of Agriculture determined to establish an experimental bulb farm at Bellingham, Wash., on the shore of Puget Sound, where the soil and climatic conditions most resemble those of Holland.

In 1908 the Department began work by planting 170,000 bulbs on ten acres of rented land. The plants flourished exceedingly, and without the disease or failures so frequent in the home plantations. In 1911 more land was se-

What and Why is the Internal Bath?

By C. Gilbert Percival, M. D.

THOUGH many articles have been written and much has been said recently about the Internal Bath, the fact remains that a great amount of ignorance and misunderstanding of this new system of Physical Hygiene still exists.

And inasmuch as it seems that Internal Bathing is even more essential to perfect health than External Bathing, I believe that everyone should know its origin, its purpose and its action beyond the possibility of a misunderstanding.

Its great popularity started at about the same time as did what are probably the most encouraging signs of recent times—I refer to the appeal for Optimism, Cheerfulness, Efficiency and those attributes which go with them and which, if steadily practiced, will make our race not only the despair of nations competitive to us in business, but establish us as a shining example to the rest of the world in our mode of living.

These new daily "Gospels," as it were, had as their inspiration the ever present unconquerable American Ambition, for it had been proven to the satisfaction of all real students of business that the most successful man is he who is sure of himself—who is optimistic, cheerful, and impresses the world with the fact that he is supremely confident always—for the world of business has every confidence in the man who has confidence in himself.

If our outlook is optimistic, and our confidence strong, it naturally follows that we inject enthusiasm, "ginger," and clear judgment into our work, and have a tremendous advantage over those who are at times more or less depressed, blue, and nervously fearful that their judgment may be wrong—who lack the confidence that comes with the right condition of mind and which counts so much for success.

Now the practice of Optimism and Confidence has made great strides in improving and advancing the general efficiency of the American, and if the mental attitude necessary to its accomplishment were easy to secure, complete success would be ours.

Unfortunately, however, our physical bodies have an influence on our mental attitude, and in this particular instance, because of a physical condition which is universal, these much-to-be-desired aids to success are impossible to consistently enjoy.

In other words our trouble, to a great degree, is physical first and mental afterwards—this physical trouble is simple and very easily corrected. Yet it seriously affects our strength and energy, and if it is allowed to exist too long becomes chronic and then dangerous.

Nature is constantly demanding one thing of us, which, under our present mode of living and eating, it is impossible for us to give—that is, a constant care of our diet, and enough consistent physical work or exercise to eliminate all waste from the system.

If our work is confining, as it is in almost every instance, our systems cannot throw off the waste except according to our activity, and a clogging process immediately sets in.

This waste accumulates in the colon (lower intestine), and is more serious in its effect than you would think, because it is intensely poisonous, and the blood circulating through the colon absorbs these poisons, circulating them through the system and lowering our vitality generally.

That's the reason that biliousness and its kindred complaints make us ill "all over." It is also the reason that this waste, if permitted to remain a little too long, gives the destructive germs, which are always present in the blood, a chance to gain the upper hand, and we are not alone inefficient, but really ill—seriously sometimes, if there is a local weakness.

The accumulated waste has long been recognized as a menace, and Physicians, Physical Culturists, Dietitians, Osteopaths and others have been constantly laboring to perfect a method of removing it, and with partial and temporary success.

It remained, however, for a new, rational and perfectly natural process to finally and satisfactorily solve the problem of how to thoroughly eliminate this waste from the colon without strain or unnatural forcing—to keep it sweet and clean and healthy and keep us correspondingly bright and strong—clearing the blood of the poisons which made it and us sluggish and dull spirited, and making our entire organism work and act as Nature intended it should.

That process is Internal Bathing with warm water—and it now, by the way, has the endorsements of the most enlightened Physicians, Physical Culturists, Osteopaths, etc., who have tried it and seen its results.

Heretofore it has been our habit, when we have found, by disagreeable, and sometimes alarming symptoms, that this waste was getting much the better of us, to repair to the drugshop and obtain relief through drugging.

This is partly effectual, but there are several vital reasons why it should not be our practice as compared with Internal Bathing.

Drugs force Nature instead of assisting her—Internal Bathing assists Nature and is just as simple and natural as washing one's hands.

Drugs, being taken through the stomach, sap the vitality of other functions before they reach the colon, which is not called for—Internal Bathing washes out the colon and reaches nothing else.

To keep the colon consistently clean drugs must be persisted in, and to be effective the doses must be increased. Internal Bathing is a consistent treatment, and need never be altered in any way to be continuously effective.

No less an authority than Professor Alonzo Clark, M.D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: All of our curative agents are poisons, and as a consequence every dose diminishes the patient's vitality.

It is rather remarkable to find, at what would seem so comparatively late a day, so great an improvement on the old methods of Internal Bathing, as this new process, for in a crude way it has, of course, been practiced for years.

It is probably no more surprising, however, than the tendency on the part of the Medical Profession to depart further and further from the custom of using drugs, and accomplish the same and better results by more natural means: causing less strain on the system and leaving no evil after effects.

Doubtless you, as well as all American men and women, are interested in knowing all that may be learned about keeping up to "concert pitch," and always feeling bright and confident.

This improved system of Internal Bathing is naturally a rather difficult subject to cover in detail in the public press, but there is a Physician who has made this his life's study and work, who has written an interesting book on the subject called "The What, The Why, The Way of the Internal Bath." This he will send on request to anyone addressing Charles A. Tyrrell, M.D., at 134 West 65th Street New York, and mentioning that they have read this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

It is surprising how little is known by the average person on this subject, which has so great an influence on the general health and spirits.

My personal experience and my observation make me very enthusiastic on Internal Bathing, for I have seen its results in sickness as well as in health, and I firmly believe that everybody owes it to himself, if only for the information available, to read this little book by an authority on the subject.—Advertisement.

cured and 869,000 bulbs were planted, producing plants and blossoms superior to those of the same variety in Holland. Already there is a great demand for these bulbs by farmers and florists along the Pacific coast where the cost of transportation from the government station is not great. However, the greatest demand for these government-grown bulbs must come from the East, to which section the freight on such goods is almost prohibitive, for even though the department gives away the bulbs it cannot meet the shipping expense, and so florists and others, along the Atlantic seaboard, find it cheaper to buy their bulbs in Holland and pay for their transportation.

By the introduction of labor-saving devices, unknown in Holland where labor is cheap, the department hopes to lessen materially the cost of production and to increase the supply of bulbs. It should comfort the lovers of the lily family to know that within two years there has come cheap water transportation, via Panama, from Puget Sound, and then we may expect to find each spring our Eastern gardens all ablush and aglow with tulips, hyacinths, narcissus, and crocuses.

Starved Lands

EVERY abandoned farm is a starved farm, a farm reduced to sterility by having all its fertility exhausted. Wide-awake farmers — and happily the number is yearly increasing—are coming to realize that if paying crops are to be won from the land, it must be fed, fed as are the horses that plow its surface, and the man that holds the plow.

So important has become the subject of feeding hungry lands, that the leading governments of the world are paying it more and more attention, for while great armies may be thought necessary to defend a nation, there can be no question as to the fate of a nation whose people are not properly fed. Our own efficient Department of Agriculture has been, and is, so much alive to this need of feeding starved lands, that it is now prospecting our resources with the view to making us independent of foreign sources of supply, for some, if not all the ingredients that go into the composition of proper plant food. One of the essential ingredients is potash salts, an adequate supply of which is assured after certain engineering difficulties have been overcome. Our fields of phosphate, another essential, are the largest in the world, being practically inexhaustible. So far, nearly all the potash used in fertilizing compounds has come from Germany, and that country is now forced by the war to stop the supply exported to foreign countries. Recently it has been discovered that on our Pacific coast, extending from the State of Washington to southern California, there are enormous sea-fields of kelp, the marine flora from which the essential potash can be had at a reasonable cost and in unlimited quantities. The hungry lands cry for food, and the cry will increase and continue, but happily the forethought of our country is making ample preparations to meet the demand.

THE NEW LAND

THE new land, the last land!
Where all our journeys end,
Where shouts of welcome sweep the strand
And friend awaiteth friend!
No eye hath yet beholden;
No foot of man hath trod
Those streets all bright and golden,
The highways of our God.

The new land, the last land!
Which way it lies we know,
For hither are its odors fanned
When soft its breezes blow;
So on we press with yearning,
In toil and service blessed;
By faith the hills discerning
Of our eternal rest.

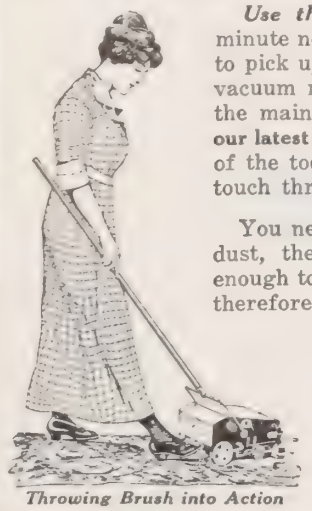
The Domestic Vacuum Cleaner

Stands for the Sanitary Home. It does the work of a Carpet Sweeper and a Vacuum Cleaner without raising a dust, and dust is unsanitary.

Any ordinary carpet sweeper will scatter dust, and so will the brush attachment of a combination cleaner if used more than is necessary.

That Lever Brush Control

an exclusive feature of the Domestic, has revolutionized the way of using the Combination Vacuum Cleaner.



Throwing Brush into Action

Use the Sweeper Brush as little as is necessary — a minute now and then when the vacuum nozzle has failed to pick up the threads, lint, or any surface litter. The vacuum nozzle, not the sweeper attachment, should do the main part of your cleaning. The eccentric lever is our latest and most important invention. By a slight touch of the toe the brush is thrown into action and another touch throws it out again.

You need not use the brush long enough to raise any dust, therefore your cleaning is sanitary, nor long enough to injure your floor covering by wearing the nap, therefore you double the life of your rugs.

You have two indispensable devices, without either of which your home is incomplete. It requires no more time to operate both than one alone. You throw the sweeper brush on or off as often as you desire without stooping or hardly stopping the machine.

Important and Essential Features of the Domestic are fully described in our new Booklet, "What It Is and How It Does It." Send for a copy today.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Map furnished by the Anti-Saloon League

"WET" AND "DRY" MAP OF THE UNITED STATES, JANUARY 1, 1914. BLACK, "WET"; WHITE, "DRY."

A SALOONLESS NATION*

THE question is asked, why not a saloonless nation? The saloon, bad enough at the start, has been growing steadily worse until at last it has so provoked the public conscience and so polluted every form of individual and political life that the people of the nation have determined to destroy it.

The question is also asked: "How is the saloon to be destroyed?" It is being destroyed from the economic side. Great trunk railroad lines will not hire men without a proviso that if they frequent saloons their contract is broken. Almost no great business institution cares for a young man who frequents the saloon. The working people more and more see that the rum shop is their great enemy, that it botches their work, lessens their hours of service and reduces their pay on Saturday nights. Lord Kitchener, the other day, issued an order forbidding the shipment of intoxicating drinks to officers of the English army in the war zone, stating that they were injurious to the men and the service. It is reported that the Czar in this war has forbidden his soldiers to have the vodka which so disabled them in the Russo-Japanese war. And it is also claimed in the despatches that the Czar has closed the saloons throughout his domain in Europe, in the interest of efficiency and patriotism. Secretary Daniels removed the wine mess from the officers of the United States navy, on the ground that it was not good for the public service.

While the saloon is going from reasons of economy, its swifter destruction is from the active, open and united hostility of the Christian Church, which is pretty nearly unanimous in its official declarations against the saloon and in the active participation of the members in its destruction at the polls. The Anti-Saloon League, which had its birth twenty years ago, is an army which has much to do in uniting the Christian churches of various denominations in this warfare against the saloon. There are today 35,000 pulpits opened to its representatives and the various churches of this country give it $1,250,000 annually in collections.

The Third Party Prohibitionists for forty years have been fighting the liquor traffic and have aroused much of the public sentiment which has crystallized into a great anti-saloon movement of today. The Women's Christian Temperance Union has for thirty-five years been a tremendous power in the warfare against the saloon in the wet and dry campaigns and in securing legislation. Other temperance organizations have done their work well. The church temperance organizations are also very busy.

In a free country the saloon has to go by legislative enactment. At the great Anti-Saloon League Convention held at Columbus, Ohio, it was decided to take definite ground and introduce a national constitutional prohibition bill. The temperance organizations of all kinds are united in the effort to promote that bill. Senator Morris Sheppard introduced it into the Senate and Representative Hobson into the lower House of Congress. A delegation of 2,000 men of the Anti-Saloon League and 1,000 women of the Women's Christian Temperance Union marched down Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, to the Capitol and asked for the introduction and passage of this bill. It is now in the Rules Committee and is not likely to be acted upon earlier than next December.

The greatest temperance legislation so far effected in this country was the recent passage of the Interstate Commerce Amendment Bill, which forbids the illegal transfer of liquor from wet into dry territory, and which, if the law shall be held constitutional, the liquor people themselves say will wipe out at one stroke one-third of all their business in the country.

The greatest victories so far have been won by local option contests, leading in some States to State-wide prohibition, until now, as shown in the remarkable map printed on this page, furnished by the Anti-Saloon League, the saloon has been driven out from two-thirds of the geographical area of the United States, including more than one-half of the population.

There are two chief parts to this big "How"—first, by enthusiastic helping in these local contests; and second by bringing pressure to bear directly upon your representative or senator in Washington by petition, letters and telegrams to vote right on prohibition legislation pending there.

One of the young people's organizations, in its program for Temperance Day, asks the additional question: "When will ours become a saloonless nation?" That is up to you—and to the rest of the good people of America. It will be done as soon as Christian America determines to have it done. But matters are moving rapidly. Since the first paragraphs of this article were written another tremendous battle has been won for the Temperance forces. On September 2 Virginia, by a big majority, put itself into the proud list of States totally "dry."

Sozodont
for the Teeth

Time is the test—Sozodont has been used since 1846. No other preparation for the teeth can point to equal length of service.

Because personal tastes vary, Sozodont is available in Paste, Powder and Liquid. Your dentist would no doubt advise you to use either the Paste or Powder in the morning to polish the teeth, and the Liquid at night, because it gets in between the teeth and around the gums, stimulating and hardening them, and cleanses better than Paste or Powder.

Sozodont is alkaline and neutralizes the acidity of the mouth. There is no better "teeth insurance" than Sozodont. It has been accepted beyond doubt by thousands of dentists and hundreds of thousands of individuals—since 1846—as the most satisfactory dentifrice. If you have never used it, take out your "teeth insurance" to-day. All druggists sell Sozodont preparations for the teeth.

PREACHING BY THE SEASIDE

NEVER perhaps, since the days of George Whitefield, who first inaugurated field preaching, have such multitudes been reached as at Brighton Beach, N. Y., this summer, through the open air Gospel work conducted by Mr. W. E. Stephens and his associates. Meetings were held on Saturdays and Sundays from 5 to 7 P. M. This is the third year of this work. Last year 133,450 persons were reached; this year the total attendance aggregated Two hundred and twelve thousand eight hundred and fifty-four, by actual count with an automatic register, in the hands of an experienced person who registered only those who stopped and tarried to hear: 212,850 persons reached by the gospel message at an expenditure of two-tenths of one cent per soul.

The highest number of attendance in any one day was 16,625—on August 31. These services consisted of singing, Scripture reading and short Gospel talks directed to the passing throng. The object was to reach the non-churchgoers, and particularly at a time when many of our churches were closed. The conversions reported this year exceed the last, and the influence of these meetings has extended all over Brooklyn and to distant parts, in Jersey, Long Island and elsewhere; so much so, that it is believed Brighton Beach may some day become a religious resort.

The speakers were Rev. William N. Richie, D. D.; George W. Carr, the evangelist; Will H. Houghton, a converted actor; Rev. H. W. Hodge; Howard Richie, from Moody Bible Institute, Mr. O. E. Konkle, and W. E. Stephens, director of the work.

Occasionally a gospel bell ringer and a cornetist assisted, but the music for the most part was simple Gospel singing by a large chorus on the platform, led by excellent soloists, and participated in by the multitudes who used the song sheets distributed freely.

The work was supported by the free will offerings of Christian believers. "How to reach the masses" is a problem which seems to be solved by the Open Air Gospel Services. "How to reach the masses" is to go to the masses. Who would have thought that 212,850 persons could have been reached, and induced to turn aside from the procession of pleasure seekers to hear the Gospel in these days of infidelity? And yet that is what has been done.

When we were children we were taught to lock hands together and say:

"Here's the church,
There's the steeple,
Open the door
And see the people."

Then we would unlock the hands and show the church full of people. Alas! It's not so now!

They are out at Brighton Beach; down on Coney Island: "Out in the highways and hedges": "in the streets and lanes of the city." In all such places there are men and women who may never come asking the way to Christ.

POEMS OF CONTRAST

A Mother's Carol

WHEN Jesus in the manger lay
With Mary brooding o'er him,
The Wise Men came from far away
To lay their gifts before him.
O Child of Mary, meek and mild,
Pour gifts upon my little child!

When Jesus in the manger lay
And Mary yearned above him,
A star of guidance led the way
For those who came to love him.
O Child of Mary, meek and mild,
Pour love upon my little child!

When Jesus in the manger lay
And Mary watched his sleeping,
A song of angels hailed the day
That from the East came leaping.
O Child of Mary, give my child
The light of daybreak undefiled.

When Jesus in the manger lay,
In childhood's mystic glory,
The shepherds in far fields away
Were told his wondrous story.
O Son of Mary, sweet and mild,
For thy dear childhood, bless my child.

ARTHUR L. SALMON.

An Indictment

WHAT have you done, you sons of men
Gifted with rights divine,
With all Earth's largesse at your feet
Pressed out like ruby wine;
Her harvest for your gathering
Her commerce for your greed,
Her flocks and herds and feathered fowl
For all your utmost need?

What have you done, you pirate crew
That run the ships of State,
You monsters of the mighty hand,
Whom common men call great,
You kings of power and finance,
You lords of land and greed;
Is this the best that you can do
For all your earthly need—

To plunge the world in horror red,
To lay the strongest low,
To loose the fiendish dogs of war
That Greed her crown may know;
A crown of warring millions
Of blood and lust and tears,
Of starving infants; ruined lands
For twice a hundred years?

LISTERINE

Use it every day

A bottle of Listerine, the safe antiseptic, should be included among the traveler's toilet requisites. There is nothing like it as a mouth-wash—protects the teeth and sweetens the breath. It is soothing to the skin when used as a toilet wash after shaving.

Many other uses given in folder wrapped around the bottle. Don't risk using imitations—they may be unsafe.

FLOWERS FOR THE DEAD

comforters, and pulling Lige with her toward them.

"Ain't they—fine—Aily?" Lige passed his roughened hand over the soft blankets, awkwardly—almost tenderly—but Aily had espied the chair of little garments and began to clasp them lovingly in her arms.

"Oh, ain't that blue one purty, Lige!" she breathed at last tremulously.

Just then, through an open door, she caught sight of her little cook stove, set up ready for use, and her table pluming itself under a shiny white cloth.

"Come in here, Lige," she gasped, excitedly, moving toward the seeming miracle. "I bin jest hungry for one of them white cloths all a my life—Ain't it purty?" she concluded, wistfully, smoothing it with loving touch.

There was a sharp rap at the door, and Lige came back carrying a covered waiter.

"Mis' Blake sent us supper," he announced in an awed voice.

"I wonder why they do it, Lige," Aily puzzled. "I—I guess it's account of the—baby," she finished, with new tears on her cheeks.

She took off her coat, and with Lige's blundering assistance, arranged the generous contents of the waiter on the new white cloth, and just then the motherly neighbor, coming in with the children, was persuaded to have the first meal with them.

It was almost a silent one, and after the dishes were washed and the wondering children were religiously scrubbed and put to bed in the new gowns, and Lige had gone down to the company's store for "jest a minnit," Aily's heart, overflowing with grief and wonder, felt the sudden aching need of expression.

She and the motherly neighbor sat opposite each other by the new fireside.

"I don't—know what we'd a done without you, Mis' Rogers," Aily began tremulously. "Ever'body else has bin so good to us today, too, seems like I cain't git usto it bein' this way, so suddent. Seemed like up to las' night the world had bin showin' its dark side to us so long, and the—the baby a-goin'—makin' it so tur'ible much blacker, I jest thought I'd never be able to—live through it all. And I thought maybe the Lord was a-punishin' me fer some of the hard things I bin thinkin' sometimes, and puttin' in words, too, sometimes, about us bein' so pore and not havin' things like other folks—"

Aily paused to wipe away a tear with the back of one thin hand.

"We all have them feelin's at times, Aily," her listener acknowledged in a contrite tone of voice.

"I know you don't have'm, Mis' Rogers," Aily protested, "and I don't feel like tonight that I ever would any more myself. Jest think! this mornin' I was a-grievin' b'cause I didn't have a flow'r fer—fer my baby, and when I went to—to see her agin, she was jest a-layin' there in a flow'r garden, it seemed like, that Mister Her'in and Mister Anders'n and Mister Blake had sent fer where flow'ers grow all the time.

"And, Mis' Rogers, jest look what else they done while me'n Lige was—gone—to—to put our baby away. All the way home I was a-dreadin' so to come back—knowin' she wouldn't be—there; and when we drove up, Mr. Her'in was a-waitin' to bring us here where our things had bin moved. And you done seen all the nice things they brung. I never can fergit it. The only thing a-troublin' me now outside of grievin' fer my baby is fer you and the others to haf-to live on down there in the cold this winter. Seems like I cain't be glad as I ought."

A look of amazement overspread the visitor's face. "W'y, Aily," she cried, "ain't nobody done told you?

The New Howard Ionic

The latest achievement of the HOWARD Watchmakers and one of the most beautiful Time-pieces ever designed.

The HOWARD Ionic—12-size, 17-jewel, extra-thin, open-face, the movement adjusted to three positions, temperature and isochronism, cased in a single-joint gold-filled case of special design, exceedingly flat and compact—price $40.

Owing to the extreme care given to the finish and adjustment of every HOWARD movement, only a small number of these new watches will be available this year.

The more enterprising jewelers will make a point of having a few to show, and we would strongly advise anyone who is interested to see the Ionic and make reservation at an early date.

A Howard Watch is always worth what you pay for it. The price of each Watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH. The jeweler who can is a good man to know.

SOFA PHILOSOPHY. I.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

VERY often during the light, cool summer evenings, or the cozy fire-lighted winter ones, the Boy calls on the Girl, and as they sit on the very old, but infinitely comfortable davenport they talk of many things.

"Nobody loves me," sing-songed the Boy, as he moved to the extreme edge of the sofa and kicked viciously at the edge of the rug. "Everybody hates me! I'm going out into the garden and eat worms—"

The Girl raised her eyes—pleasant, rather inquiring eyes they were—and looked meditatively in the direction of the speaker.

"I suppose," she asked, "that people would love you better if you ate them?" It was a question.

"Them?" The Boy was obviously puzzled. "Them?"

"The worms, of course!" explained the Girl just a bit sarcastically.

"Oh! the worms—" the Boy laughed apologetically, and moved a bit nearer to the middle of the sofa. "Why, the worms were only a form of speech—a song—a metaphor! I meant that—that," he stumbled in his effort to explain.

"A dish of mental worms," supplied the Girl, as he paused. "Isn't that what you meant?"

"Exactly," answered the Boy with a smile (he had an attractive smile), "a sort of way to let people know how badly you feel."

"But I thought the idea was old-fashioned, archaic," protested the Girl with lifted brows. "I'm not a cynic at all, but I know that men don't often kill themselves, or give away their money, or—or eat worms to let the world see how badly they feel." She laughed.

"Now you're making fun of me," protested the Boy with a half frown. "And just because I quoted a silly little couplet. People do lots of the things that you say they don't do—anyway the papers are full of things every day. Why, not long ago I read about a man who committed suicide on the front porth of a girl's home, because she wouldn't marry him. Don't you call that letting the world see how badly you feel?"

"No, I don't!" retorted the Girl. Her hand, a slender, rather nervous hand, puckered her light dress in little pleats. "I call that showing the world how cowardly, and mean, and unpractical he could be. If he had waited a few minutes and thought, he would never—never have blown out his brains. (Is that the way he did it?) He not only killed himself, but he hurt the girl's reputation!"

"But," the Boy was plainly protesting, "but what would you call it? He certainly didn't kill himself for fun!"

The Girl folded her hands in her lap, and looked across the room at nothing at all. (It is a little habit of the Girl's—this gazing—and at times it is a bit disconcerting.)

"Once," she told the Boy, "when I was very young—very small, then" (in answer to a chuckle at the other end of the sofa) "I had a new dress. It was white, and covered with very fine lace, and fussed up with miles of embroidery. I was very proud of the dress, and wanted to wear it on every possible occasion. One day the Sunday school had its annual picnic, and mother told me that I could go. She was rather careful about straw-rides, and sleighs, and picnics, mother was, because she had heard of dreadful accidents, and so it was a great treat to be allowed to go. I began planning at once.

"'I shall wear my white dress, my new one,' I remarked.

"'Oh, no,' answered my mother, 'that is the best dress you have. Besides, it would not be suitable for a picnic. You had better wear your brown gingham. It won't show dirt, and it will be hard to tear.'

"A picnic—my first—and a brown gingham! I could not reconcile the two in my mind.

"'If I can't wear the white one, I will stay home,' I retorted. And," the Girl paused, "I stayed home!"

"Yes?" the Boy questioned politely, "but what is your point?"

"Why," the Girl widened her eyes in a surprised, babyish way, and looked at him. "Don't you see the point? I thought that it would jump right out at you."

"Explain," the Boy laughed. "I'm not clever, you know," he added.

"Why," the Girl joined in his laugh, "I stayed home, and the white dress hung next to the brown one in my closet, and I sulked in a corner, while the rest were enjoying themselves. I knew in my heart that mother was right and that the brown dress would have been the most appropriate. But I wouldn't give in; I stayed home."

"But," the Boy moved to the center of the sofa eagerly. "But you stayed home to let the world know how badly you felt—to eat your dish of worms."

The Girl raised eyes, mournful with recollections, to the good-looking face at her side.

"They didn't even miss me at the picnic," she told him, "there were so many. No, it wasn't showing the world how badly I felt."

"What would you call it?" asked the Boy.

"I've heard my mother, answered the Girl softly, "classify it as 'biting off your nose to spite your face.'"

The Boy was worsted in his argument.

"We've talked enough," he said, "about this old, silly, 'Nobody loves me' business." Sharply he looked at her:

"You made me say it anyway," he told her.

A clock chimed softly in the next room, and the Girl yawned obviously as she moved to the farthest end of the sofa.

"It's getting late, isn't it?" she said.

A THOUSAND SOULS WON IN AFRICA

DOUBTLESS some of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will recall that, a few months ago, I made an appeal through the columns of the paper for financial assistance to provide an additional missionary among the Kroo people in a new field along the west coast of Liberia. The response was sufficiently generous to enable me to place Rev. Sam McKeown of Illinois at an important center. Brother McKeown did most excellent work, as not only preaching to the people at their regular service, but by teaching a day school that proved a great blessing to many.

Here his success has been more marked and far-reaching than at any point since he has been laboring in Africa. He has adjusted difficulties in the past, built a new church of corrugated iron, and succeeded in uniting the membership. He has a good day school of upwards of forty pupils, and letters recently received from him informed me that on a recent Sabbath there were anywhere from six hundred to one thousand people present at the service.

I know of no point at which a better showing can be made for the short time we have been at work, and I trust that our friends may feel gratified that they have been permitted to participate in carrying forward a work that is not only checking the abuses of heathenism, but transforming the lives of hundreds who, only a short time ago, knew nothing of the saving grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

FROM Dickinson, N. Y., comes this happy letter: "Mr. and Mrs. Bowen have heard from their son." The grateful mother continues: "I thank the Prayer League for their prayers and am praying for all of them."

Mrs. M. writes from Canada: "I wish to make known how graciously God has answered prayers for me, and that my son might find employment, and for a younger son who was very ill. He had been preparing to take entrance examinations, but was not able to write on account of his sickness. I told him to take it to the Lord in prayer, and the board of examiners, who had heard of his illness, passed him on his monthly reports." Mrs. T. S. H. writes: "I am bound to write to tell you of the goodness of our loving heavenly Father and what he has done in answer to your prayers. My son has been fortunate in getting into a good law office in our home town, and we have disposed of our farm." M. A. L. writes from Michigan: "I wrote requesting prayer for my niece and her two children. Their future seemed so dark financially. I wish to write to the praise of God, that through the prayers, as I believe, of his children all have found excellent positions."

Mrs. B. S. B. writes from Tyler, Texas: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for renewed health when my life was despaired of. My recovery has been declared a miracle by physicians and surgeons who know my case. I give all the credit to God." M. H. writes: "Some months ago I was in great distress, and asked prayer through the Prayer League for a daughter's health. God graciously answered my prayers and yours in a wonderful way." A friend writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in wonderfully answering several prayers, especially restoring my health." Mrs. R. E. C., of Craik, Sask., writes: "I prayed to God, and he saved me from a great trouble. Praise his holy name." Mrs. J. S. B. writes from Richland, Ore.: "I asked the Prayer League to assist me in a special prayer. In about two weeks from the time I wrote an answer came in such a way that I know it was from God."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

Mrs. W. L., Creighton, Neb.; Mrs. A. E. G., Carrington, N. D.; Miss J. B., Auburn, N. Y.; Mrs. L. C., Stiles, Texas; Mrs. J. H., Lake View, Canada.

Mrs. E. E. P. requests prayer for revival services at Knightsdale, N. C.; Mrs. O. T. for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Canute, Okla.; Mrs. M. W. C. for spiritual awakening in a church at Waterbury, Conn.; W. B. for blessing upon the English-speaking church at Wither, Wis.; H. E. B. for revival at Syracuse, N. Y.; Mrs. W. C. E. that the church may have a great revival; Mrs. C. J. W. for a revival in Kilburn, Perth and Andover, N. B., Canada; B. L. V. for state-wide prohibition in Ohio and Pennsylvania; S. E. J. for revival in church at Oakhurst, N. J., that many may be brought to Christ; E. L. K. that a way may be open for a minister to resume work as an evangelist. A minister writes to ask prayers for relief from distress and for employment in the ministry. A reader who is a semi-invalid asks prayers for help and guidance in gaining admittance to a Home.

Mrs. L. M. R. and Mrs. J. C. W. ask prayer that the minds of sons be restored; J. R. K. that a young man's mind may be restored; K. E. D. and Mrs. M. C. R. that the minds of sons may be strengthened; Mrs. F. B. G. that daughter's, Mrs. W. H. D. and G. V. C., brother's; Mrs. B. L. V., a sister's; Mrs. E. A. B., a little girl's; M. B. G., a teacher's; two other friends that their own minds may be strengthened.

R. A., M. B., Mrs. M. C. W., Mrs. L. S. ask prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. J. A. L. and E. E. that sight of daughters may be restored; M. A. L., a friend's; Mrs. N. L. J. that her sight may be strengthened. Five friends request prayer that hearing may be restored for themselves or friends; H. P. and Mrs. C. L. F. request prayer that sons may be saved from the drink habit; Mrs. A. E. B. that son and his wife; L. M. G. and Mrs. A. R., husbands; S. M., I. V. E and Mrs. J. S. R., brothers, C. J. S., an old man; S. E. J., a young man.

AN EIGHTY-DOLLAR CHURCH

THE first church for the use of Lutheran Esthonians in the United States was recently erected within the space of a fortnight in Bloomville, Wis., a settlement of Lutherans from Esthonia, one of the Baltic provinces of Russia. They are served by Pastor Conrad Klemmer of Bogota, N. J., a native Esthonian, who also preaches in Finnish. His parish extends from Boston, Mass., to Bisbee, Arizona. On May 13, the missionary arrived in the colony, and in a meeting held the same day, it was resolved to build a church on ground previously acquired for that purpose. The pastor acted as architect, contractor and superintendent.

JUSTLY PROUD OF THEIR WORK

Early the next day, after the land had been cleared of the remaining tree stumps, ground was broken for the foundation, the members of the church, with the pastor in the lead, doing the work themselves. While the cement foundation was settling, the necessary lumber, most of which had been donated by members of the church, was hauled, and after two weeks' arduous work, from sunrise to sunset, the little church stood complete, including pews, altar and pulpit. It measures twenty-six by sixteen feet and has a steeple thirty feet high.

On Whitsunday, May 31, the church was dedicated. In that service four children were baptized, five young people were confirmed, and twenty-six partook of communion. Of the $100 available for the building only $80 had been used. The work among the Esthonians is carried on under the auspices of the Missouri Synod of the Lutheran Church. This body also supports missions among the Letts, Finns, Hungarians, Persians, and others.

Flowers for the Dead

Mr. Herrin's a-goin' to pull all them po're folks' houses down an' build a new row jest like this'n—wall-paper-in's an' all. They started in today."

Aily was silent a moment from sheer astonishment, and when she spoke her eyes were bright, even through a rush of tears.

"Oh, Mis' Rogers," she sobbed, "I'm a-cryin' for joy an' sorrow, too. It might' near seems like my baby a-goin' has brung about all this change. I'm jest a-goin' to b'lieve it has, anyhow, fer then I won't feel like it's right to grieve so hard fer her. W'y, today when I seen her in all the purty clo's Mister Anders'n sent, and with all them white roses about her, I jest thought nothin' could a bin more wonderful like th'n them flow'rs fer the dead, but tonight, knowin' all the rest, it seems like I git a cl'arer vision somehow, and I can see jest how much more wonderful it's a-goin' to be to have flow'rs and things for the livin'."

LIGHT BOOZE

Do You Drink It?

A minister's wife had quite a tussle with coffee and her experience is interesting. She says:

"During the two years of my training as a nurse, while on night duty, I became addicted to coffee drinking. Between midnight and four in the morning, when the patients were asleep, there was little to do except make the rounds, and it was quite natural that I should want a hot cup of coffee about that time. I could keep awake better.

"After three or four years of coffee drinking I became a nervous wreck and thought that I simply could not live without my coffee. All this time I was subject to frequent bilious attacks, sometimes so severe as to keep me in bed for several days.

"After being married, Husband begged me to leave off coffee for he feared that it had already hurt me almost beyond repair, so I resolved to make an effort to release myself from the hurtful habit.

"I began taking Postum and for a few days felt the languid, tired feeling from the lack of the coffee drug, but I liked the taste of Postum, and that answered for the breakfast beverage all right.

"Finally I began to feel clearer-headed and had steadier nerves. After a year's use of Postum I now feel like a new woman—have not had any bilious attacks since I left off coffee."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

POULTRY SECRETS DISCLOSED

We offer to all poultry raisers the essential knowledge and secret methods of many of the most successful poultrymen of America. As a rule these secrets have been guarded with extreme care, for it is on them that the great successes have been built. They will cost YOU only a trifle and a few minutes to write us.

How We Obtained These Secrets

Michael K. Boyer, Associate Editor American Poultry Advocate, has had exceptional opportunities and the closest friendship with poultrymen all over the country. They have freely told him many of their most jealously treasured secrets, many others we have bought, and this scattered material, together with several of Mr. Boyer's own valued methods, has now been collected in book form. It must be clearly understood that every secret has been obtained in an honorable way.

"Poultry Secrets"

First published in 1908, this collection of the carefully guarded secrets of famous poultrymen created a sensation in poultry circles. It has run through fourteen editions, and is still selling at a lively rate.

Is this cock properly held? "Poultry Secrets" tells you how to carry fowls, and scores of secrets far more important and hitherto unrevealed.

READ WHAT PURCHASERS SAY

I received Farm Journal and "Poultry Secrets," and am very much pleased with both. The secrets are worth their weight in gold. Why, I paid $5.00 for the sprouted oat method. You certainly give a fellow over his money's worth.
Andrew F. G. Morey, Utica, N. Y.

I purchased a copy of "Poultry Secrets," and find many helpful ideas in it, especially Dr. Woods' Egg Hatching Secret.
Mrs. F. T. Darnell, Westfield, Ind.

By putting within our reach these "Poultry Secrets," you are doing a more philanthropic work than giving alms or endowing hospitals, for you make it possible for us to make both ends meet.
L. Boyce, Milwaukee, Wis.

Received your book of "Poultry Secrets." It's an exceptionally instructive work, and worth $10 to any progressive poultryman, I would not care to take that for my copy if I could not get another.
Robt. F. Kingsland, Montville, N. J.

The Farm Journal came to hand, and later "Poultry Secrets" also arrived. I was very glad to receive them and have been greatly interested in them. You are doing a glorious work in diffusing such valuable knowledge for so little money.
F. B. Meade, Boston, Mass.

As to "Poultry Secrets," I will say, I have lectured on this subject over the greater portion of this state for the past 15 years, and have about every book that is published on this subject in my library. I consider this book the most valuable I know for the general public.
L. A. Richardson, Marine, Ill.

SENSE AND NONSENSE

CONDUCTED BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

ON KEEPING THE SABBATH

HOW necessary it is for folks while they remain on this mortal spere to comply with all its rules and regulations! Keep a calm and collected mind, and watch out and not let their hasty and careless footsteps blunder off into by-ways of error. Many and beautiful are the side paths leadin' off seemin'ly amongst the flowers, that tempt one from the hard beaten highway of Fact and Common Sense. Broad are the big fields of poppy and mandrigora that steep the senses and understandin' in their drowsy odors, and causes one to forgit the straight path of Reason and Truth through which the right road leads. Bright and golden shine the myraid stars in the deep blue heavens above, that tempt one's admirin' gaze, and you lose sight of the path you are walkin' on, till your forgitful and careless feet stumble over some sharp stun, and then while you rub your achin' stun-bruised toes, you remember and deplore the fact that you didn't keep closter watch and see where you wuz goin'.

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

It all happened on a Sunday. I had had a very full week, oncongenial visitors, relations on his side, who found fault with me in a polite way about everything, from my pies to my principles. Because they liked me so well, they said, and felt free. And I had had plumbers a soldiering and soddering, and divers other tribulations, all the forepart of the week. And the last of the week a stiddy drizzlin' rain kep' us in-doors. Josiah had hired a shamblin' long-limbed chap, a stranger in Jonesville, to help in harvesting. And I d'no whether he did it out of ignorance or laziness, though I incline to the latter belief, but 'tennyrate he it wuz that went ahead on us and led us through the path of Error down into the sombry valley of Humiliation.

He wuz a real persuadin' and slick talker and a splendid worker when he did work, but he wuz always more than willin' to stop. And I could see that he hailed the rainy weather as a priceless boon so's he could lay round and soldier, while Josiah wuz most wild about his sufferin' crops, and the delay caused by the bad weather.

At last there come a bright sunny day, and I spozed it wuz Saturday, but Jotham, the hired man, come to breakfast in his best clothes with a him book in his hand, and wearin' a sanctimonious look on his linement, and Josiah sez:

"What are you dressed up so for when you know we have got to tackle the east lot this mornin'?"

"Tackle the east lot?" sez he. "Do you work here Sunday? If so I will leave, for I will not desecrate the Sabbath with labor."

"It hain't Sunday," sez Josiah; "it is Saturday."

"Yes," sez I, "it is Saturday, and I must git out my carpet rags that I colored yesterday."

Why, Jotham acted fairly pitiful towards us on account of our ignorance. And bein' a slick talker, at last, suffice it to say, he convinced us that it was Sunday, and Josiah wuz so disappinted to think he couldn't git his oats away (he had a big load on the barn floor all ready to take to Jonesville), that he went to bed and laid there most all day, a restin', he said, before his hard work begun agin', and I sot in the settin' room with my Bible and CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Well, the next morning I got out my washing in good season, and it being so early when I got through, I washed a blazin' star bedquilt, and a sunflower, and the clothes looked so white, and the bedquilts looked so handsome and dashy, I spread 'em out on the line to make 'em show off all they could. And I hung out my red and green rags I'd colored for my carpet. They wuz a beautiful color, so I strung 'em out on the line nighest to the road, and wuz proud on 'em.

Well, Josiah took a hasty bite and started for town with his high load of oats, that he had promised to deliver to a farmer jest beyond Jonesville. He said he'd be back in time for Jotham to mow, and for me to tell him that right after breakfast he must take the scythe and cut round the trees and fences so's to be ready for the mowin' machine.

Well, Jotham didn't appear till breakfast wuz ready, but after that he went out into the oat lot with his scythe. And in a little while Josiah come back a complainin' that there wuzn't a soul to help him, and he had to onload himself, and sez he, plantin' himself before me: "Is there anything wrong with my looks or clothes, Samantha?"

And I sez, "No, you don't look any worse than common, Josiah."

"Well," sez he, "if I'd been a one-legged porcupine everybody I met couldn't looked more curious and wonderin' at me."

And I sez, wantin' to comfort him, "I wouldn't mind it, Josiah. I've seen folks that look humblier than you do. There is that one-eyed pedler, and the chap that got his nose broke off, and—"

I wuz goin' on to bring up other comfortin' samples of humbliness, such is a woman's love for her pardner, but he broke me off short by goin' out and bangin' the door.

But he met Jotham right on the thresholt, and as I opened the door to shake my table cloth, I see Jotham looked kinder tired and sweaty, and sez he: "I've been a thinkin' and I believe I made a mistake yesterday, I believe to-day is Sunday."

"You want to lay round and keep two days, do you!" hollered Josiah, mad as a hen. "Well, you won't, not if I know myself. Do you hitch onto that machine and go to mowin'."

But Jotham said his conscience wouldn't let him work till he knew it wuz a week day. He belonged to a meetin' house, and wuz bound to keep its rules.

Josiah wuz too mad to argy with him, and he hitched the horses onto the mowin' machine himself, and went creakin' and lumberin' out into the oat field. It lay right along by the side of the road, and whilst he wuz raisin' the echoes with the noisy whirr of the machine and his hollerin' to the horses, Deacon Bobbett and Cornelius Gowdey drove along with their families bound for meetin', and stopped horrified at the sight of Josiah, a deacon too, a laborin', and called to him to know what he wuz doin' desecratin' the Sabbath by workin', and what I could mean by washin' and colorin' on the Sabbath day."

"How many days do you want us to keep?" hollered Josiah back pale with wrath; "we kep' Sunday yesterday, and you'd better go home and go to work."

They see his mistake and pitied him, and at last convinced him they wuz right, and he come in and told me, and then I wuz plunged into mortification.

But my powers of philosophy wuz such that I rallied and wuz able to comfort Josiah by sayin' we wuz perfectly innocent, and therefore we could not be blamed by any just people.

I consoled him a little, but the arrow that rankled the deepest in his breast wuz the sight of Jotham layin' at ease full length in the hammock the picture of happiness and laziness.

$930,000 Per Week Paid for HUDSON Cars

$235,600 Paid by Users in One Day

On September 15 — the day before this is written—dealers sold to users 152 HUDSON Six-40's. That is, yesterday buyers of new cars paid out $235,600 for HUDSONS.

The average has long been $930,000 per week—because that is the limit of output. We are building and selling 100 per day. That is five times as many — five times, mark you — as we sold at this season last year. And we had no war then. Our average sales have more than trebled since August 1st.

Means That Hudsons Rule This Field

In July — when we brought out this new model — we trebled our output to cope with demand. Thirty days later—despite our best efforts—we were 4,000 cars oversold.

We shipped by express nearly 1,000 cars to minimize delays. That is unprecedented. But thousands of men waited weeks for this car when other cars were plentiful. No other could satisfy men who once saw this new-model HUDSON Six-40.

Five-Fold Increase An Amazing Thing

Consider that the HUDSON has long been a leading car. Every model for years has been designed by Howard E. Coffin. He has brought out in these cars all his new advances. And the demand for his models—long before this Six-40 — gave HUDSONS the lead. The first HUDSON Six, inside of one year, made us the largest builders of six-cylinder cars in the world.

Think what a car this must be—this new HUDSON Six-40 — to multiply this popularity by five in one year. And to do it at a time like this. Think how far it must outrank all the cars that compete with it. Think what a tremendous appeal it must make to car buyers.

Think how it attracts—how it must excel—when in times like these they pay $930,000 per week for it. And they would have paid more had we had the cars to deliver—as shown by yesterday's sales of 152 cars.

The HUDSON Six-40 is today the largest-selling car in the world with a price above $1,200.

See the Car That Did It Howard E. Coffin's Best

Go now and see this model—the car whose record is unmatched in the annals of this line. You will see a quality car sold at a price which is winning men by the thousands from lower-grade cars.

You will see a class car — in many respects the finest car of the day — sold at one-third what class cars used to cost.

You will see how clever designing and costly materials have saved about 1,000 pounds in weight. And in this light car — the lightest seven-seat car — you will see one of the sturdiest cars ever built. You will see a new-type motor which has cut down operative cost about 30 per cent.

You will see new beauties, new ideas in equipment, new comforts, new conveniences. You will see scores of attractions you have never seen before.

They are all in this masterpiece of Howard E. Coffin, who has long been the leading American designer. This is his finished ideal of a car, and many count him final authority.

Mr. Coffin has worked for four years on this model, with 47 other HUDSON engineers. Part by part, they have refined to the limit every detail of the car.

This is the acceptable proven type. This lightness, beauty, economy and price are new-day standards which men are demanding. And this quality — Howard E. Coffin's level best — is the least men will take when they know.

Now is the Time

Now is the time to pick out your new car. Next year's models are out now. You see what the field has to offer. And the best touring months are before you — the Indian Summer days. Get your new car and enjoy them.

If you buy a class car, this new HUDSON Six-40 is the car you'll want. The exclusive features which have won so much favor are bound to appeal to you. Your dealer will see that you get your car promptly if we have to ship by express.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

This is a translation of the story of palm and olive oils written in the hieroglyphics of 3,000 years ago.

The characters and the translation are correctly shown according to the present-day knowledge of the subject.

Read hieroglyphics down and to the right.

Today one of ancient Egypt's best arts is becoming universal knowledge. Apparently Nefertiti, Hatasu, Cleopatra, and other queens of Egypt, all used Palm and Olive Oils at their daily toilets.

To these two natural sources they owed much of their celebrated beauty.

For over three thousand years these cleansing oils have been famous for their cleansing, softening and beautifying virtues.

So we use them in Palmolive Soap. We unite them in a scientific blend which greatly enhances their old-time efficacy.

No other combination we know of is so soothing, so cleansing, so truly beneficial to tenderest skins.

In the form of Palmolive these healthful oils are today used in millions of world homes. The utter purity of Palmolive is evidenced by the delicate green color — due to Palm and Olive oils. The exquisite fragrance is a veritable breath from the Orient.

Fifteen cents per cake puts this truly regal luxury within easy reach of all.

THE CATHEDRAL OF RHEIMS

WHEREVER you go you see Studebaker Cars —wherever you go you find loyal, enthusiastic Studebaker owners.

The Studebaker is essentially the family car.

No other car is so distinctly a feature of American family life.

No other car is so generally used by the whole family.

No other car is so extensively, so easily and so safely driven by so many different members of the family.

The Studebaker car is light, easily controlled, and thoroughly reliable.

Sixty-two years of honest manufacturing are back of it.

It represents the fulfilment of the Studebaker ideal.

It is not simply a "good" car—it is sincerely the best car that Studebaker can build.

The Studebaker car is manufactured complete in Studebaker plants.

The materials are analyzed, selected and tested by Studebaker engineers.

Every process of manufacture is under the close personal supervision of the men who design the car.

Being manufactured complete in Studebaker factories, there are no parts-makers' profits to pay.

Quantity production, abundant resources and wonderfully equipped factories make possible economies that could not otherwise be realized.

Hence Studebaker cars are essentially quality cars.

Such cars could not possibly be sold at Studebaker prices if it were not for Studebaker manufacturing methods and the experience, resources and facilities of the Studebaker organization.

The new Studebaker Automobile Book is just ready—Write for it.

GOD'S WAIF

WHEN news reports of distress in the wake of ıe armies in Europe ultiplied, the ques- on of calling upon hristian America to d the destitute came o in the CHRISTIAN ERALD councils. Read- s had already begun urge such a move- ent. Friends who ok it for granted that e would, as in many mes past, open a re- ef fund, began to send in their gifts in readiness. irst came two dollars; then one; then ten; five; naller sums; larger. And by one channel and nother the indisputable facts about the rapidly creasing need came in. Presently there remained doubt as to our duty. At once steps were taken perfect the machinery for collecting and dis- ibuting a great charitable fund. An announce- ent to the press resulted at once in nearly two ndred newspapers opening their columns.

The first appeal in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ap- eared September 16, at which time $292 had en received through practically no effort on our art. Even yet the announcement has not had me to make itself thoroughly felt, and yet the nd has been swelled by daily receipts of between 00 and $700. September 21, $627.90 came in; ctober 1, $738.60. Our mail is reflecting a wide- pread wish that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD do all its power to aid the widows and orphans of the ar. There is no doubting the purpose of our read- s to make this the most bountiful charity ever lministered for them by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. As we go to press with this issue the total re- ipts amount to $6,091.69. The response to our in- tation to recognized leaders in the various de- minations to compose an Advisory Committee et with unanimous acceptance.

The board of representatives abroad, who will ndle the fund in the different countries, is almost mplete, and their names will be given later. We ay now be said to be in readiness to carry through is latest project of Christian helpfulness, and have every confidence that THE CHRISTIAN ERALD family will see to it that our trained cilities are taxed to the limit. Every day brings esh evidence of the urgent and awful need into nich thousands of women and children have been unged. Some of these things are told below. The uation seems to defy language. The need is too eat to be told in any other words than: Help us we perish.

READER, imagine yourself in a railway car- riage, traveling over the one hundred and enty miles or so that separate Ghent from tend. In the train with you are some two to ree hundred women and children, with a scatter- ing of old men. There is a mother, holding her baby to her breast, and staring with wide eyes ahead of her. She is thinking of the child of seven, who was ill of scarlet fever when the soldiers came to their little town, and who died of fright at the sight. So quick was the flight that the little body had to be left unburied in the cottage.

But it is not there now, for the cottage and the village are alike in ashes.

The trip which generally takes about three hours now takes three days, for the train has often to stop while the troops reconnoitre ahead. Near the mother, on the train, is seated an old couple. They, too, are speechless—for they are thinking of the years which they have spent accumulating a little fortune, which was now making their latter days easy. Only yesterday it was wiped out. Except for the clothing they wear, they have no more than the beggar at their door. They have eleven sons in the war, but can expect no help from them, since no one knows where they are. They have also three daughters, to one of whom they are now going; poor as she is, she will do what she can for them.

One of the common sights in the train was of well-to-do women who had become paupers over night. There was a woman from Malines, who owned 110 houses; now she has not even a waist to her dress, nor the money to buy one. This fact makes the destitution in Belgium especially hard, for the richer ones, who in other countries are helping the poorer, are here themselves paupers.

East Prussia shares with Belgium today the horrors of an invaded land. It is a country about half as large as New York State, devoted to farming and grazing. No cities nor ports are there, scarcely any large towns, and the destruction of property, when it takes place, as it has all over this battle ground, where Russian and German armies have contended, is absolute.

The farmers and their families are not fleeing for rescue as they are doing in Belgium, but are staying in their burnt and devastated farms and villages, and starving. A call for help comes perhaps more strongly from them than from anyone else today. Five hundred of these East Prussian villages have been burnt to the ground. Those nearer the border have fled to the adjacent cities, as Frankfort-on-the-Oder; and aid is being extended to such as are there. But all cattle were killed, and the great need is for money to re-stock the farms and purchase farming implements, to replace those which were burnt in the barns.

In some cases the despair of those obliged to leave their homes in these different lands was so great that they killed themselves. We read in the Cologne News how refugee families are being gathered into public halls, and fed and clothed for the time being as may be. Their number reaches into the thousands, and as time goes on, many of them will become permanently dependent on charity.

THAT the hearts of Americans of all classes have been stirred with sympathy for the suffering women and children, is becoming increasingly evident from the many letters on the subject that reach us by every mail. F. J. L., Laporte, Ind., writes: "Find enclosed draft for $5 toward the Widows and Orphans War Relief Fund. May the Lord open the heart of every CHRISTIAN HERALD reader to help in this great need. Bless you in the work you are doing to help the helpless at this time of terror in Europe. May the Lord soon stop this bloodshed is my prayer."

Mrs. E. B. H., Ossining, N. Y., sends this touching letter (enclosing $10 as her own contribution to the Fund and 50 cents for E. M., her maid): "I wish to call your attention to her gift (the maid's). It is much like the poor widow's mite. She has but one hand, the other having been injured in an accident, necessitating its amputation."

"Three Friends," Homersville, Ohio, send $2 to the Fund, and write: "We would be glad to send more, but our income is small. Mother said this morning she wished we could send a hundred dollars. We hope that that little we give will help feed the hungry, and that many others of their abundance will donate much to help on the good work."

"Every meal we prepare," write Mr. and Mrs. J. E. G., Salem, Ohio ($1), "we remember and think of the women and children who are hungry."

C. S., Miami, Fla., writes: "Kindly accept this ($1) from a young man who is thankful that God, in his grace, has kept the devastation of the European conflict from our country's threshold."

"If I live till next April I will be 88," writes Mrs. E. O. L., Rock Island, Ill. ($1), "and I have but small means; but I can't resist the desire to help the widows. I was a widow of the Civil War myself, and know the heart of a widow."

The gallant crew of the Hog Island Life Saving help the widows and orphans. These brave, big-hearted [illegible] what suffering and hardship mean.

Many of the gifts are sent with a fervent prayer. "May God's richest blessing rest upon your work for suffering humanity," is the pious aspiration of Miss K. M. J., of Greer, S. C., who sends [illegible]

"My prayers go with this, that God will incline the hearts of the [illegible] that peace may come," is the earnest petition of Mrs. H. E. P., Westbrook Point, Conn. This prayer is repeated in many other letters.

AND now, having read these things, look upon these pictures. And as you look, remember that those women searching in the débris of their home for any household treasures that may remain have nothing with which to start life anew. That forlorn lad—where shall he look for a mother's touch now? What are the agonies of that aged grandmother fleeing forever from home and friends? And to whom shall that widowed mother with her three little ones go, since all who might have aided her had she been bereft in times of peace are themselves now destitute as she?

MADE DESTITUTE BY THE DESTRUCTION OF TERMONDE

Friends, it is a time for instant action. It is a time to show our Christian colors. The CHRISTIAN HERALD fund goes into the very scenes of this calamity, and will be applied to the best possible form of relief in each individual case.

Whether you give little or give much, you want your gift to be spent on these sufferers, in the name of Christ. Therefore, send it without delay to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe. He gives twice who gives quickly, that was never truer than now.

ADIRONDACK LUMBER CAMP MISSION

A CREW of river drivers were gathered about their camp-fire, glad of its warmth, even though it was a June day. They had their drive of some 12,000 cords of four-ot pulp-wood nearly out of Lake Kushaqua, one the beauty spots of the Adirondacks; and the ng delay caused by the boom breaking and the gs being scattered by the north wind was soon to d. Late that afternoon they had boomed in the st stick of wood, and the crib was ready to be wed to the foot of the lake, as soon as the wind nt down or shifted to the south.

Living under canvas and exposed to all kinds of ather on the drive, to be at any hour ready to ke advantage of favorable conditions, wet to the ees and often to the waist day after day, makes iving river not the most pleasant part of lum-ring, even though the pay is the best and there is lost time. The men are strong, brawny fellows, od-natured and uncomplaining, skilful, and hard rkers. Most of the crew were of French-nadian extraction, and all but three spoke the glish language. Such is often the case. In the mps are found native Americans and Irish; oles are being introduced; Indians come in from e reservations along the St. Lawrence, and occa-onally Germans are seen. In the hauling season, the more accessible camps, the American farmer es in with his team to earn a good "stake" in irty to sixty days. He is usually an expert at is line of work, and is one of the best teamsters e find. But as an all around lumberman, the rench-Canadian has no superior. Give a crew of vo a double-bitted ax and a well-set cross-cut saw, nd they will fell the trees and cut their one hun-red logs a day with comparative ease.

COMBINING BUSINESS AND PLEASURE

Supper is cooked partly over the camp-fire and artly in the stove set up near by. Such a meal onsists of warm biscuits baked before the open re, pork and beans and fat pork, strong tea, the ver-present boiled potato, and cake, cookies and ies of several kinds. In the lumber camps there is much larger variety, but then the whole outfit oes not have to be moved every few days, so the ook has a better chance—and disposition.

The service is held after supper, with the men athered about, standing or sitting around the ook tent. It is an attentive and respectful audi-nce, with now and then audible approval of the reaching. But these remarks are made in good spirit and are friendly. Indeed they encourage the preacher, for they make him think he is "striking fire." Still, the man who will approve everything said against drink will go out the next day and spend his earnings in riotous living, and undermine his strength and energies with "booze."

Services are short, snappy, and incisive. Short Scripture readings, prayer, and the sermon make up the order of the services. Sometimes hymns are sung, led by the preacher. Music in an Adirondack camp is such a scarcity that we have very little success with it. In the Western camps, where the work has been carried on for years, the men are more accustomed to singing and do it very well. Perhaps, though, the success may depend on the leader. Frank Higgins can get the men singing lustily, but he is without a peer in the camp work.

Last year, on a tour of the camps, one of the missionaries was a strong singer and a Methodist. The first night out we visited a small camp of twenty men. The singing was poor. The next night the camp we visited had a number of Poles, who did not know our language, but the singing was better. Next night, the camp was about as large, and my friend got them to singing with great spirit, and with considerable music in the singing, too.

Other effects are noticed besides the singing. For some days after a meeting has been held, the chief topic is religion. Lively debates are had and religious beliefs are approved or condemned. Many of these beliefs are very crude, and some of the religious debates are not very edifying. Religion is more a name than a possession; it is not a power to restrain from evil and to constrain to righteous living. One man said all his brothers and sisters had gone over to the Catholic religion, but he would follow the ways of his fathers, declaring: "I was born a Baptist and I'll stick to her."

In some camps women do the cooking; in others whole families are found. These are not the rule though. Women make the camp life better, and their presence about the cook shanty works not only for a cleaner place, but for cleaner speech on the part of the men. The tone of the camp is improved by them.

A set of camps consists of the bunk-house, cook-shanty, office, barns, blacksmith shop, and root cellar. The location is always determined by the water supply—either on an unfailing stream, or near a good spring. This is an absolute necessity. Then, as a job is for two or three years, the camp must be conveniently situated so as to cover the whole job. One prominent feature is the constant changing of the men. They come and go all the time. We are preaching to a new congregation every time we visit a given camp.

Three of us were in the McKeever region, looking up camps in which one of us was to work later. The shorter route from one camp to another was over Woodhull Mountain. On the top we met the genial fire-warden in his neatly kept shanty. He seemed pleased to see some one to talk to, took us up on his lookout, showed us the mountains and lakes, and guided us down the other side of the mountain to our tote-road. Up that steep trail he had carried all the boards from an old lumber camp to build his shanty. We left him a copy of the New Testament.

Next day, on the same tote-road, we met a man returning from a trip to a small city. He had spent all his money, had lost a coat and vest, and was in debt for a bar-bill. A kindly talk was given on the foolishness of drink. The terrible results of sin were pointed out to him, and the Gospel preached to him in a simple, kindly way. He, too, received a Testament to read when he would. Such is the sowing of the seed by the wayside. There are countless opportunities.

In one camp, the cook asked if we were going to a certain sporting place, and when we answered that we were camp missionaries and were going to have a service after supper, he was the most astonished man to be seen. But he later hurried through with his work to have the cook house ready for the service, and was a most attentive listener.

DENOMINATIONAL NEWS FROM THE FIELD

—THE REV. SETH VANDER WERF, formerly pastor of the First eformed Church, Pella, Iowa, has been elected field secretary f the Board of Domestic Missions.

—ON SEPTEMBER 30 a party of five missionaries sailed from ew York for England en route to Bombay, India, sent by the merican Board of Foreign Missions.

—AT THE SECRETARY'S office of the Board of Foreign Mis-ions of the Presbyterian Church increased alarm is felt over he situation in West Africa, and the board is anxiously await-ng some word from that section. Nothing has been heard for eeks. One of the missionaries whose husband is in Kamerun, erman territory, has received no letter since heavy fighting egan. The danger of a Moslem uprising in North Africa is reatly feared. The danger would be accentuated if Turkey hould become involved in war. The militant orders of North frican Mohammedanism, always a source of menace to Chris-ian work, will be especially alert at this time.

—THE GENERAL EXECUTIVE SESSION of the Woman's For-ign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church ill be held in Buffalo, October 29 to November 5. Among the minent speakers will be Bishop J. W. Robinson of India, ishop Edwin H. Hughes, Dr. W. F. Oldham, secretary of the oard of Foreign Missions, formerly Bishop of India and the hilippines; Dr. Robert E. Speer, of the Presbyterian Board, nd Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, president of the Baptist oard of Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. Mrs. William razer McDowell, wife of Bishop McDowell and president of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, will preside over the xecutive session.

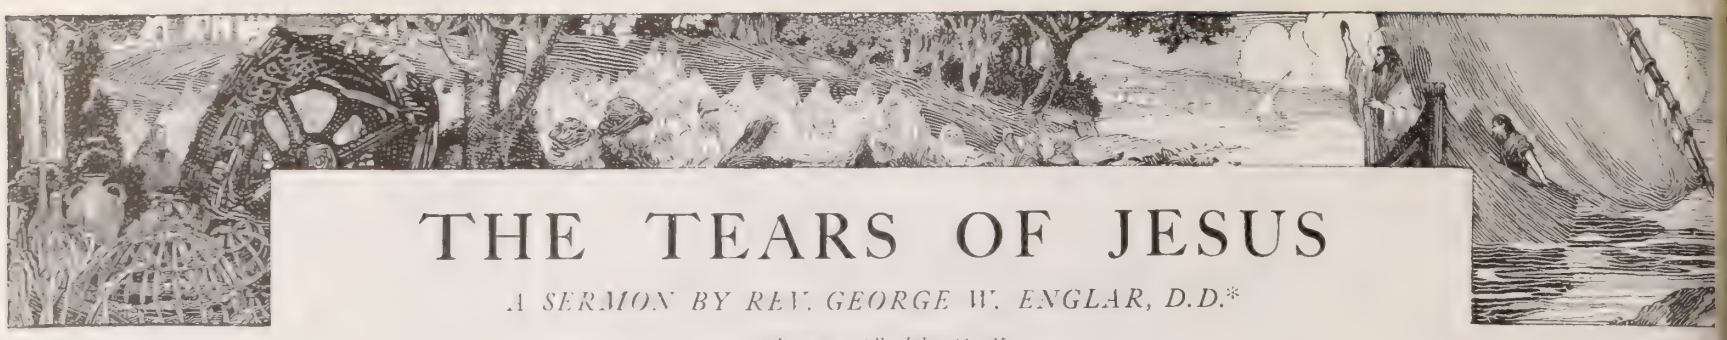
—THE GREAT INDIAN CONFERENCE, which assembles at Lake Mohonk, New York, Oct. 14 and 15, will include a discussion of other dependent peoples and an important program. The treatment of Indian affairs will occupy at least three sessions. Liquor as affecting the Indian problem will be discussed; civil service in relation to Indian administration; the Indian as a human being, his status and needs in home, school and religious life. The discussion of Philippine matters will be thorough and exhaustive, as the subjects indicate: Future relations between the United States and the Philippines in the light of pending legislation; economic and social aspects of the contact of Americans with the peoples of the Philippine Islands; the Moros as a factor in the Philippine problem.

—AT THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the war situation is daily increasing the danger to their mission work, especially in North Africa. The missionaries, it is said, have suffered great financial distress, and only with extreme difficulty was the board able to get any relief to them. Missionaries in Liberia have not been heard from for some time and the keenest apprehension is felt by their relatives in America. The bishop on the field in Switzerland and surrounding territory writes that through all the terror and sorrow the hearts of the people are stirred to the profoundest depths. In many places special prayer meetings are being attempted. In one church was a mother whose five sons had to go to the front. Before the young men left all were converted. Formal meetings are being held in the churches for departing soldiers. There is notable religious progress in North China.

—AN INTERESTING LETTER has just been received by the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church from Mrs. J. W. Bashford, wife of the bishop representing the board at Peking, China, in which she describes an "opium burning." From $13,000 to $20,000 worth of the drug, pipes, lamps and fixtures were destroyed. Many coveted curios, beautiful pieces of brass and cloisonné were thrown into the flames to make sure of complete destruction. The chief of police was in charge of the ceremony, aided by officials and soldiers. Packages of opium in broken, sticky masses were cut open with huge cleavers and kerosene and salt thrown on to aid the conflagration. Just prior to this, at Foochow City, nearly $50,000 worth of smoking apparatus and opium had been destroyed in front of the native custom house. It consisted of five chests of raw opium, which had been seized by a Chinese merchant retailing the drug. The bonfire lasted over six hours.

—THE AMERICAN Missionary Societies in Hungary have been appealed to in an attempt to put a bill through providing compulsory service for women in time of war under five divisions: in hospitals; as cleaners and menders of soldiers' clothing; as camp cooks; as telephone and telegraph operators, typists and chauffeurs, and in emergencies. Women suffragists rise to know if this includes voting.

—THE FOLLOWING message is received by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church: "The situation in South America is unchanged and, especially deplorable in Chile, as she depends almost exclusively on her nitrate exports from which she derives a triple revenue. Big houses are closing down, the saltpeter fields have stopped work; hundreds, even thousands are finding themselves out of work; no rate of exchange has been fixed by the banks since July 30; one bank has failed and others are shaky; prices are soaring, business is practically at a standstill. I have never seen Chile in such a pitiable plight. However, the government is doing the best it can.



THE TEARS OF JESUS

*A SERMON BY REV. GEORGE W. ENGLAR, D.D.

"Jesus wept." John 11: 35

IN THE whole range of religious literature, this noted verse is one of the most remarkable. It has the distinction of being the shortest verse in the Bible. For simplicity and directness, such as is necessary to make a strong appeal to the heart, it leaves nothing to be desired. It has the virtue of brevity which makes it stick in the memory; it surprises; it overwhelms. It stands out like a clear-cut gem; there is no doubting its purity and transparency. The simplest may read and understand. But of all the things which, on preconceived grounds, we should have expected of the Son of God—the Word which was in the beginning, by whom all things were made—this was the last to be expected.

Jesus was the effulgence of Divine Glory. He claimed a unique relationship with God. His career showed that he could draw upon a wonderful reserve of divine power which overwhelmed his enemies. Yet, with all his superhuman attributes and powers—he wept! What we know of his motives and his actions forbids us to assume anything save that the tears were real, bitter tears, pressed from our Lord in the sadness of this hour, and as the cause had to be equal to the effect, they showed that deep down in the heart of the Lord something lay rankling, disturbing his soul.

His Human Compassion

Three times we are told that Jesus wept. Once he wept over a lost world, when in Gethsemane, bowed in sorrow such as was never felt before, he mingled his tears with the bloody sweat. Once he wept over a lost city, when he looked at Jerusalem and foresaw the destruction that soon would lay it level with the ground. Jerusalem, the city of David, beautiful for situation, the center to which all Jewish eyes were directed, was soon to become a prey to the eagles of Titus. Soon Rome should allow the Jew, "a man without a country," to weep once a year on the ruins of the capital, for which privilege he had to pay an exorbitant fee. With prophetic vision, Christ could tell what was coming. He thought of the misery, the bloodshed, the terrors of a prolonged siege, and then of the proverbial stubbornness of his countrymen; of the long years of impiety which had hastened the impending doom—"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings. . . . If thou hadst known, if thou hadst only known!" And he wept—broke into a passion of lamentation over the prospect which it was now too late to save.

The other occasion on which Jesus is seen in tears brings us to the tomb of Lazarus, the lost friend of the Saviour. The situation is a highly dramatic one. A crowd of curious onlookers, some pathetic, others antagonistic, form the setting, as it were. In the background is the closed tomb, holding the form of an only brother. Martha, the practical, Mary, the loving, and Christ, the acknowledged Lord, who was now to prove himself mightier than death—these are the main persons. Imagine the mixed emotions to be read on the different faces—the eagerness of some, the doubt, the troubled mind, the malice, the grief, the despair. Ah, here is a scene worthy of the brush of a Raphael. It moved even the Master to tears. Here, there is no loud lamentation, but rather a quiet shedding of tears in sympathy.

But why, why should he be thus moved? There can be no doubt that Jesus took the mourning as a sign of an insufficient trust in his divine power. He had been among these people for some time. They, more than most others, should have believed in his claims. Despair is practical atheism; and those dearest of all friends would not regain hope in the presence of death. Their conduct was, essentially, a denial of his mastery over the Arch-enemy. It was this that must have pained him beyond words. He was from above, they were still bound to the earth. They feared death and were discouraged because of the mortality of the body; he taught the immortality of the soul and in triumph said unto them, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me shall never die."

But the main cause for those tears was the intense compassion with which his heart must have overflowed in the presence of the grief-stricken friends. "When Jesus, therefore, saw her (Mary) weeping and the Jews also weeping, he groaned in the spirit and was troubled." The Jews were right in their interpretation of the Saviour's actions. "Behold, how he loved him!" Oh, the miracle of redemption! That he who could summon ten thousand angels and make the elements do his bidding; he before whom kings had trembled—that he should weep over a man, because he loved him!

His Human Sympathy

With some of us moderns it is considered a sign of weakness for a man to weep. Not so was it among the ancients. The Greeks did not feel that they debased themselves when they thus gave utterance to their feelings. Perhaps it was better so. At any rate, we would never wish to have this record of Christ's compassion blotted from the sacred narration. We might revere and obey the commanding Christ, but we love the weeping Christ. Those tears are a token that he belongs to us. "He was a stranger to nothing human." He could be touched with the feelings, the common aspirations, the disappointments and sorrows of our humanity. He is ours; we claim him by the right of kinship. A fellow-feeling makes all equal.

This, then, the humanity of our Lord, as proved by a common effusion of his feelings, is the great truth which our short verse inculcates so forcibly. A Saviour who can understand man, who can make common cause with a down-trodden race, because he has entered into its most personal experiences, "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh," a person with Divine power, yet with a human heart—that is the Saviour whom men can trust.

The search everywhere today is for a real humanity. We want men and women, not the unnatural demigods and giants of fairyland. The books which are to interest must have a strong, personal, human element. History, as studied now, is the history of the people. The arts and sciences have a permanent value to us only in so far as they are correlative to the common human life which is active all around us. Give us men! Men equal to the tasks of life. Men who will not flinch in view of the complex duties of the world; men who cannot be crushed, or intimidated, or bribed, or fooled; men with big hearts and little conceit; men who will not sully their integrity for mercenary or any other reasons; men whose manhood goes to the very core of their being. It were an ungracious act to depreciate our common humanity. With all our sinful shortcomings, the blots and blurs of imperfect lives, we still have reason to be proud of our own. Even if we are not the people with whom Wisdom shall die, we have done wonders with our birthright; we have thought and planned and worked to some effect. We would be under condemnation if we had not. And, best of all, God has made common cause with us. He took on the burden of flesh and honored us with his presence, and the Gospel of Jesus Christ has been so blessed and helpful and powerful because it has given aspiring but weak manhood a model of how to live this human life. The incident, then, at the grave of Lazarus satisfies our longings for things which are penetrated with the warm blood of humanity.

More specifically, however, the tears of Christ suggest his unbounded sympathy for mankind. No doubt the sight of a woman like Mary throwing herself at his feet and crying, with tear-choked voice, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," would have been too much for most natures. The heart of our Saviour could not consistently steel itself against the emotions that arise in the sight of suffering. The sympathy of the Saviour! Such a clause almost sounds like a heaping of words. Sympathy means suffering with another, and only through suffering could Christ constitute himself the Saviour of the world.

His Human Fellowship

At the best, there is a great deal of misery in this world—enough to compel the sympathy of any but the hardest of natures. To be sure, we should be thankful for life with its glorious privileges. We pride ourselves on our self-reliance. We will be pitied by no man. We will stand on our o feet or not stand at all. But behind all this lu the consciousness that, with all our boast strength, we do not get so very far. Have y seen anything of this world? Then, you know t misery is an alien to no spot where man liv There is a skeleton in every household—the sk grins at the most joyous festive board. Penseroso with leaden steps everywhere follo the quick-footed Allegro. Sorrow is our comm heritage; the "trail of the serpent is over us al But we have a Friend. Thank God, that he h stuck to us in all the vicissitudes of life, and have the assurance of his ever-abiding presen

There are untold powers lying hidden in t recesses of the earth; they only need to be u chained and human life goes like a puff of smo And if death were only all! The greatest of ev is not death. The heartburns, the disappointmen the disillusions of life, the sad mistakes, t wrong starts and lame conclusions—these form swarm of evils to harass man as long as he liv The lesser evils may be avoided. A man can sure his house against loss by fire. If he is si he can get a doctor; some have even defied death f a season. But no person can run away fr himself. The Evil One may bargain, as the sto goes, for a man's shadow; but the troubled co science sticks closer than the shadow. And G oversees this whole seething, rushing life of ou He knows all our weaknesses. He hears the cri of distress and anguish. He understands the m tives which guide us in our actions. He is not t absolute God who, as Carlyle puts it, sits apa from the world, seeing it go—

> What were a God who but with force external
> Has set the All about his finger circling!

He must be in the world, actively engaged in positively interested in it, and as a person, could not but embrace all this poor, struggli mass of humanity in his love. He is not far fro each one of us. There is balm for every wound soul!

Ordinarily, when a man is down, he does n want to be commiserated. Condescension on t part of others only irritates him. Neverthele with all his independence, he is but human. N body scorns the friend's hand that is offered true sympathy. In our hours of sadness, when t lamp of hope burns low, we crave for a word friendship; we do not want to be forgotte Sympathy is as necessary to us as our bread a water; it constitutes, in reality, the atmosphere which the soul breathes.

His Human Kindness

It is the crown-jewel in the diadem which ador the Saviour's brow, that he should, as none othe be able to satisfy these most natural longings the soul. Here was the secret of his success wi the common people. They heard him with eage ness because they felt that he could understa and appreciate their troubles. Like the gent summer rains, his words of kindness penetrates t hard exterior where a regal, patronizing attitu would only have shut up the heart forever. T greatest will succumb to kindness shown in seaso The biographer of Columbus tells us of the effe which the tears of the Queen had on the sturd discoverer. He had bravely, patiently, borne u under the storm of contumely and jealousy; h had ignored the jibes of his enemies at court; h had shown an imperturbable front when accus of treachery, but the sad face of this queen w too much for him. His pent-up emotions at la had to burst forth. He threw himself upon h knees, and in the revulsion of feeling, he cou hardly utter a word.

With this, the royal road to the human hea our Saviour was well acquainted. He had a me sage for mankind, and this message he could prea lovingly, persuasively, sympathetically. The tea of Jesus are but typical of a thousand actio which marked him the All-loving One. S how the people cling to his lips. All his wor are precious. What one subject is there und God's stars which could be presented from o hundred thousand pulpits, a hundred times a yea which could form the topic of innumerable article

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, October 18

Matthew 16: 26. "For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

WE have here the valuation of a human soul by him who gave it. The valuation is made ing two distinct lines: 1. By means of its loss; 2 By means of its recovery. When the first soul s lost in Paradise, there was a paltry gain: a ment's sinful pleasure. But suppose the stake l been greater. If the five continents and the s of the sea, the oceans with their submerged alth, all that field and forest yield, all the den treasures of the mines, all the merchan- e of the cities, in fact, the whole world, had n cast into the balance, it would not have been equivalent for that priceless treasure of man, immortal soul, which links him with God and kes him fit to be a companion throughout the less ages of eternity with God and his holy gels. Oh, what a loss, then, did occur in that al hour of the first disobedience! And now Lord speaks of an exchange for the soul that lost. The world could not produce such an hange. Even if a brother had died for a ther, a mother for her child, a Damon for Pythias, there would have been no redemption. e sinful soul cannot be accepted as the pur- se price for another. God himself had to pro- e the ransom. He gave his only begotten Son, t whosoever believeth in him should not perish, t have everlasting life. Ay, we were bought h a price!

MONDAY, October 19

Luke 9: 26, and Matthew 16: 27. "For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's and of the holy angels"; "and then he shall reward every man according to his works."

THE teaching of our Lord as to what is really gain or loss to a person in this life is utterly worldly. Heavenly valuations are never grasped by a secular mind. The Lord appeals to e crisis at the end of this world for the final rification of his teaching. At his return in glory, hich is here declared to be a fixed event in the ernal counsels of God, the correctness of Christ's range estimates will be shown. The shame which en bore for Jesus' sake, their being accounted ols for believing what he taught and for doing hat he bade them, will be turned into exceeding nor, and they will be seen to have been the sest of men for renouncing the pleasures and ofits which the world offers to the denier of rist, and for choosing the humiliations in a orldly way which the teaching of the Nazarene poses. But shame will come to those who were hamed of Jesus. Their blindness and supineness failing to see the hidden glory of his teaching d guidance, and in disbelieving his rich promises co-heirship with him, will be made manifest. the day of his reappearance he will stand be- re them in his own glory and that of his Father. is full equality with the Father in power and ajesty will be exhibited to them, and the angel ost which accompanies him will say Yea and Amen his righteous verdicts. In view of this state- ent, the Christian says: "I know whom I have elieved, and am persuaded that he is able to keep hat which I have committed unto him against that ay."

Mark 9: 1. "Verily I say unto you, That there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power."

THIS solemn appeal of the Lord to his own authority and truthfulness introduces a statement that connects both backward and forward. Backward, to his remarks about his return to judgment; forward, to his transfiguration, the account of which is introduced by the evangelists with this statement. His return to judgment was foreshadowed in the destruction of Jerusalem, which was a miniature retribution upon the despisers of Christ and typified that last and comprehensive judgment which he will render to all at the end. It was also foreshadowed in the glory in which he appeared to the disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration. Both events were witnessed by men who had heard the Lord utter the words in our text. When men hear of the lay of judgment they think of that as a very distant affair. It is true, nearly two thousand years have elapsed since these words were spoken, and the world is still standing. Yes, but in all these years the eternal counsels of God have ripened toward maturity. The kingdom of God has been coming with power; the conquering valor of divine truth has been shown in innumerable instances, men have had a foretaste both of heaven and of hell in the present life, and have acknowledged that, in general, the events of past and present history contain not a faint hint, but a strong assertion of that judgment to which the whole course of human affairs is tending.

Matthew 17: 7. "Arise, and be not afraid."

ON a high mountain in the territory where Peter's confession had been made—probably on Mount Hermon—the three chosen disciples, Peter, John, and James, were afforded a gorgeous vision of the divine glory of their humble Master. The transfiguration is heaven's vindication of Peter's confession. Robed in the brightness of heaven, all-radiant with the majesty of the Most High, Christ had stood before their dazzled eyes. Peter wrote later that they had been "eye-witnesses of the majesty of God." And a solemn consultation had taken place. Moses and Elijah, the representatives of what was greatest in the ancient church of God, the law and the prophets, had discoursed with the Lord on his impending passion. The conversation had turned on the theme of the ages: man's salvation. As in a trance, the disciples beheld and listened, and Peter expressed the wish that the scene might be prolonged indefinitely. On this mountain and in this splendor let Messiah set up his throne, and hence let his rule go forth over the peoples of the earth. Then a bright cloud had begun to spread over the speakers, and the voice of the Father was heard speaking to the Son. The disciples came within the circle of this unearthly light. Awe and terror fell upon them. This light was the shechinah, betokening the presence of Jehovah. Sinful man cannot bear the presence of the holy God. But Jesus speaks to them the reassuring words of our text, and restores their trembling hearts. With Jesus at our side, we poor sinners shall not be afraid to enter the heavenly courts. God gave this glorious Redeemer to be the sinner's friend and advocate.

THURSDAY, October 22

Matthew 17: 9. "Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man be risen again from the dead."

THE transfiguration signified that the old dispensation was about to close. Moses and the prophets had done their work for men. The subject of their teaching was incarnate, dwelling as man among men. The burden of their message of righteousness and peace was nearing its consummation. The greatest era of the world's history had begun. Could the people bear such an astonishing message if it were told them? When they compared its splendid contents with the lowly walk of Jesus among them, would they not be led to doubt and cavil? Yes, would even the other disciples credit the report of what the three favored disciples had seen? Would it not lead to useless questionings and perhaps create jealousy among them? For all these reasons and others at which we cannot guess, the Lord imposes silence on the witnesses of the revelation of his divine majesty. When he has conquered death, when the hearts of the stricken disciples shall be filled with joy at the news of his return from the grave, then, and not before, will they be in a fit condition to accept this record of his glory, and fall prostrate, with Thomas, confessing him their Lord and their God. God times his revelations to men in such a manner that they may be aids, not obstacles, to faith. There are times when it is necessary that we should know, and there are times when it is best for us not to know why God acts thus or so. Both the communications and the silences of God are educational acts of the wisest Teacher, who knows both the needs and the strength of each of his pupils.

FRIDAY, October 23

Mark 9: 12, 13. "Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man, that he must suffer many things, and be set at nought. But I say unto you, That Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed, as it is written of him."

THE appearance of Elijah at the transfiguration had led the disciples to inquire of the Lord what the proper understanding of the prophecy in Mal. 3: 1 and 4: 5 might be. The Scribes rightly claimed, on the basis of the ancient prophecy, that the Messiah must have a forerunner, and he must be Elias. But as they failed to note the presence of the Messiah among them, they had also failed to note the coming of his forerunner, John the Baptist, to whom his father Zechariah, being filled with the Holy Ghost, had applied Malachi's prophecy. (Luke 1: 17, 76.) The tenses in our text have perplexed some Bible readers. In the first part the Lord speaks in the future tense, because he quotes the ancient prophecy; in the last part, he speaks in the past tense, because the prophecy has been fulfilled. The entire text is a unit. Jesus has received the witness of his destined precursor, who by his preaching showed the Jews of every rank and station their sins and need of repentance, and pointed them to the Saviour. Thus the law of Israel had been purged of false interpretations which the Scribes had attached to it, and the hope of Israel had been restored and fastened upon its proper object. The work of Elijah at the transfiguration was not the work of the Elijah of whom Malachi had spoken. Jesus is come. We need not look for another.

SATURDAY, October 24

Mark 9: 16. "What question ye with them?"

ON THE morning after the transfiguration, which probably occurred at night, the Lord and his three companions rejoined the rest of the disciples. Their arrival was very opportune. The Scribes were worrying the disciples. They had come up to this remote region, no doubt, upon their old quest of discovering something reprehensible in the Lord's teaching or actions. Not finding the Lord, they approached the disciples, bringing with them a lunatic boy and his father. They were plying the disciples with questions about their Master and his teachings, and about the possibility of having the lunatic cured by the disciples. The disciples' faith, discretion, and patience were being sorely tested, and a considerable number of people were standing about, watching the proceedings. Presently our Lord appears upon the scene. The multitude is amazed at beholding him. Perhaps traces of the transfiguration glory still remained in his countenance and bearing. The Lord now turns all the questioners to himself. He relieves the disciples and assumes their burden. The believer has the promise that the Lord will be at his side in every trying hour, and though the necessity of his coming at such an hour may prove a just rebuke of the disciples' weakness and needless perplexity, still his presence is according to his promise that his strength shall be made manifest in and through our weakness.

peeches, books and poems without tiring and disusting the public, with the one grand exception f the Gospel story? To that message the world s ever willing to listen, if it is only presented in he right way. The secret? It lies in the love of he Redeemer. "I love to tell the old, old story of esus and his love," because it is the best thing hat has ever been told. No narrative of unxampled bravery, of extreme self-mortification, or of strokes of statecraft and politics, but a simple tale of Love Divine.

Should this not be an inspiration to every one who is deep down in the sloughs of despair? Should this not purify and fill with a nobler meaning our daily meed of sorrow and pain? The loving Christ would not be exempt from the burdens of our mortality. We, too, should bear ours patiently, and when the tears come, may they all help to wash away some stain. May they lighten the heart; may they be the sign that we have sympathetically helped to bear another's load. Not even the tears of Christ will wash away the sin of persistent selfishness; they are useless on the desert of loveless lives; but to the Christian, who has learned the lesson which these gems can teach, they are fraught with a world of thought. May the tears of the Master never become our condemnation; for they were shed for our solace by the Lord of love.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

DURING the week just passed that modern "Flying Dutchman," the cruiser Emden, again made a meteoric appearance in the Indian ocean. It appears that after disappearing, as I wrote last week, from sight off Madras, she visited Pondicherry and woke that ancient city from its slumber of centuries with her cannon, and then cruising around in the neighboring seas she captured six British vessels, including one collier, whereof she sent five to Davy Jones's locker, and sent the remaining one, with its own crew and those of all the others, into Colombo harbor.

The British cruiser Cumberland also distinguished herself during the week, off the mouth of the Kamerun River, Africa, where she captured a German gunboat, the [illegible], as well as ten German merchant [illegible].

The German cruiser Leipsic also came into notice by sinking an English merchant ship off the west coast of South America; and a British ship, the [illegible], struck a floating mine in the North Sea and was blown up, no lives being lost in these operations.

There are rumors that the German war fleet is in the Kiel Canal, and that the ships are having their old guns changed to the new type of gun which proved so successful against the forts of Liège and Namur. When this refitting is finished, the story runs, the German vessels will be equipped with artillery whose range will be two miles greater than the artillery of the British fleet, and the Germans will then sail out and destroy the British fleet without the latter being able to injure them in the least. This story will probably be included in the next edition of the complete works of Baron Munchausen.

During the week Austria and Italy had a dispute on the subject of floating mines. In her desire to make the advance of the fleet of the Allies up the Adriatic towards Pola as difficult as possible, Austria had planted both anchored and floating contact mines thickly along the Dalmatian coast. The winds and tides had carried many away from their original positions and well over to the Italian coast. Several sailing boats and some say a torpedo boat of the Italian navy, have as a result fallen up with loss of life.

On Italy's making diplomatic representations concerning these occurrences, Austria agreed to indemnify the sufferers and to take such measures as would in future prevent a repetition of such disasters.

The relations between China and Japan have become slightly strained during the past few days. China protested to the Japanese invasion of her neutrality in the invading of Chinese territory by Japanese troops on their way to the German colony of Kiauchau, without defending herself. She supposed that Japan would only cross her territory, and would not seek to establish herself therein. During the past week, however, Japanese troops have seized and occupied points in Chinese territory, which by no stretch of the imagination can be considered on the road to Kiauchau from the Japanese point of debarkment.

Seeing this, China became suspicious, and has thrown troops across the appa[rent] path of these Japanese troops [and] blown up the bridges ahead. [The] situation is interesting, and sh[ould] not be lost sight of in the pres[sure] events nearer to us.

The Japanese have now comple[ted] invested Kiauchau, but at the [cost] to them of something like [two] thousand killed and a like num[ber] wounded, and they are only in [a] position to begin serious operations.

Germany has now practically [lost] all its colonies; true, there is de[s]tory fighting going on in Central [and] Eastern Africa, with losses a[s] equal to ours in the Spanish-An[eri]can War. But all Germany's isla[nds] have been occupied by the Eng[lish] and even in Central and Eas[t] Africa and in Kiauchau the en[d] merely a question of time.

The really interesting questio[n] the past few days has been whe[ther] the Germans intend to make a s[erio]us effort to take Antwerp, and [it] seems to have been decided in [the] affirmative. I say seems, bec[ause] even yet the attack on Antwerp [may] be a mere feint, having as its [ob]ject the shutting up and keeping shut within [the] walls of that city the remains of the Belgian a[rmy]. Yet, on the other hand, it seems reasonably do[ubt]ful whether the Germans would have taken [the] trouble to concentrate a hundred and fifty thous[and] men and to bring up siege guns, merely for a fe[int].

when the feint could have been made with a m[uch] smaller force. Besides, there are so many adv[an]tages from a German point of view in the capt[ure] of Antwerp that I think it is reasonable to c[on]clude that the effort is really a serious one.

If Antwerp were captured it would finally dispose of the [re]mains of the Belgian ar[my], either by their capture, or [by] forcing them over into Du[tch] territory, where they could [go] nowhere else and would be [in]terned until the end of the w[ar]. Either result would finally [dis]pose of this thorn in the Germ[an] flesh, and would end all [or]ganized resistance in Belgium. In addition, it would release at le[ast] half of the force that the G[er]mans are now maintaining in th[at] country, to be used elsewhere.

xt question that suggests itself is e possibility of success. The city Antwerp is situated on the River heldt and is considered one of the rongest fortresses in Europe, both rough the topography of the surunding country and the works of t by which it is defended. These orks of art" consist, in addition the city wall, which is of little actical value, of some eighteen lated advanced forts forming a g around the city, and connected protected causeways with each ner and with the town. These rts are of the same general type the forts at Namur and Liège, d were rebuilt at about the same ne and by the same military enneer as those mentioned. The rmans will be obliged to approach om the south, on which side the fenses are strongest.

Two months ago, before the new rman siege artillery had actually monstrated its unprecedented deructive power at Liège and Namur, should have considered Antwerp takable, but since the demonstrations spoken of ove I am of the opinion that man has as yet nstructed nothing which can withstand the asults of these terrible cannon. I have formed is opinion only after a very careful study of e effects produced at Liège, from photographs d from the descriptions of competent observers, stly military, who have examined the ruins of e forts.

Hence, I conclude that if the siege of Antwerp seriously undertaken, and the besiegers are not sturbed by allied forces coming from the south, e city will probably be taken.

Outside of this Antwerp question, Belgium has rnished little of interest during the past few ys. There have been skirmishes there of more less severity, but of no strategic importance. e present Belgian military movements have only an object the maintenance of sufficient activity necessitate the presence of a large German coverg force.

Some friction seems developing in Brussels beeen the population and the occupying force. The rgomaster has been arrested and deposed from s functions, it is said. The inhabitants of Brusls will not be showing great common sense if they tack the troops, because the reprisals will be ompt and severe, and as far as can be judged om this distance the occupation has been conicted with as much regard for the susceptibilities the populace as could well be expected.

The reports of outbreak of the Asiatic cholera nong the Russian and Austrian troops seems to confirmed. This is, of all the news of the week, e news which affects us in America the most arly. I have gone through an epidemic of cholera ce in my life, and my experience then was such to make me fear this disease greatly. The conitions existing at the front, large bodies of men ncentrated under necessarily poor sanitary conitions in bad weather, and more or less poorly d, afford the best possible material for the disease flourish in. I am very much afraid that its ogress cannot now be stayed. Under the most vorable conditions science seems powerless to eck an outbreak, and the present conditions are ything but favorable.

Once established it spreads like wild-fire. If it ere June instead of October I believe it would each our shores, but we shall probably escape for e winter at all events, since cholera never seems stand cold weather. Another thing which will d in delivering us from a visitation of the dire estilence is the fact that, owing to the present conitions, travel of any kind is abnormally slack.

PRINCE OF WALES GRIEVES WHEN LEFT BEHIND

As to the campaign along the Russo-Austrian border and in Galicia, the following seems to be a fair statement of the actual situation. I say seems to be, advisedly, because my readers have no idea of the difficulty in trying to reach an approximation of the conditions conscientiously, in view of the repeated contradictions of the cables; not only cables from opposing sources, but in the successive cables from the same sources, and even in the self-same cable.

It is, therefore, with great modesty that I say I think that the Lemberg district of Galicia is entirely in Russian hands, and that it looks as though the Russians had completely invested, but not yet taken, the fortress of Przemysl, to the west of Lemberg, and also hold Jaroslau and Rzesow, still further to the west.

At Cracow a large army of Germans and Austrians is concentrating under German command, and at or near that town to the eastward, a great battle will probably occur and the Russians will find themselves confronted with a foe of a different caliber from that of the enemy, the Austrians, whom they have met heretofore in Galicia.

If Allenstein and Lyac establish a precedent, the Russian advance will be checked at Cracow, but arguing from precedents in military matters is apt to be dangerous. In any event, after this battle is over the Russians will know they have been in a fight.

It also appears that the Russians have been completely driven out of East Prussia and that German soil is freed from the foot of the Slav invader. The Germans have crossed the West Poland border in pursuit of Rennenkampf's army, and are at or near the river Niemen in Poland, and at the same time are bombarding the Russian fortress of Augustowo, with at present no certain result.

The campaign in Eastern Prussia and those portions of Poland adjoining will very shortly be over for this year. In three or four weeks the autumnal rains, which, it is said, have already begun, will have made the ground too soft to support even men, let alone horses and artillery, and when they finish the temperature will very shortly drop to its winter average of about 5 degrees, with an extreme of 25 degrees to 30 degrees, below zero, and campaigning will forcedly stop.

While it is somewhat warmer in Galicia, the average winter temperature there is about zero, and in a few weeks more this will be reached, so that campaigning there also will halt very largely. In fact, after the battle at Cracow, I doubt whether there is any further fighting of importance in that part of the world until next May.

The importance of this cessation of active campaigning on the situation in France must not be overlooked. When the fighting in East Prussia and Austria stops for climatic reasons, it will enable the Germans to shift a large portion of the force they have in these regions to France and Belgium, a fact that will not be without a very great influence on the fortunes of the war in the West.

The Russian invasion of Hungary does not seem to make much progress. As to the war between Austria and Servia, about all that can be said with certainty is to repeat what I said last week, namely, that a state of war exists between those powers.

No news of any moment comes from the neutral Balkan States. Bulgaria has pulled the mantle of complete silence about her, while her neighbor, Rumania, though very desirous, apparently, of going to war with some one, cannot seem to make up her mind which some-one to attack. The real truth probably is that the Balkan States are waiting to see which of the opposing parties will bid the highest for their more or less mercenary support, and that when the general situation has sufficiently cleared to enable Bulgaria and Rumania to see which side is going to win, and hence which side will be able to keep any promises made, they will throw their lot in with that side.

Turkey, too, is keeping very quiet. Her army is mobilized and she is in the position of being ready for any emergencies.

The position of Italy does not become any more definite. The game of cross purposes between the different factions still continues, the radical element apparently pushing for war and the conservative element striving to remain neutral. The conservative element appreciates to the full the fact that in

THE HARVEST FIELD. FRENCH PEASANTS BURYING GERMAN DEAD

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO H SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Nation at Prayer

FROM nearly two hundred thousand pulpits the Gospel of Peace was preached on October 4, which had been designated by the President as a day of national prayer to God to bring to a speedy close the war that is deluging Europe in blood. Many millions of earnest Christians of all denominations united in supplicating the throne of mercy to end the strife. It was a grand and solemn spectacle this, of a great nation on its knees, pouring out its heart in fervent appeal in behalf of people thousands of miles away. Many of the supplicants were related to the belligerents by ties of blood and kindred.

This remarkable day was the climax of weeks of prayer. All over this land, we have been pleading for divine intercession in the war, and that the rulers and governments who are urging the strife might be brought to realize the enormity of the sin against God, humanity and civilization, and the awful suffering that is being inflicted upon millions of defenseless non-combatants. It is unthinkable that war, in our day, could be waged for the sheer gratification of the lust for slaughter. None of the Powers engaged are barbarians; yet they are none the less guilty before God and their fellow men who enter on such a course when all their differences could and should have been composed by peaceful methods, for which ample provision exists. All law, divine and human, is violated by war. And there is a lasting time awaiting every nation that takes up the sword.

Will God answer the prayers that have been offered up these weeks past and which ascended from the assembled millions like a single voice on Peace Sunday? We cannot doubt it. He will both hear and answer, but he will do justice as well as yield mercy. There is no favoritism with the Almighty. No special pleading, however earnest, will avert the judgment that awaits those who have placed power and possessions, commerce and conquest, above the souls and lives of men. Peace will come and the heavy burden of sorrow and bereavement that weighs down the innocent will be lightened. But nations, like individuals, learn through suffering. And through the whirlwind of war, not Europe alone, but the whole world will learn to appreciate the inestimable blessing of peace. The nations are passing through the furnace of trial. If it shall burn out of the hearts of rulers and cabinets and parliaments and peoples the besetting sin of militarism, the love of power, the racial antagonisms, and the commercial jealousies, and give them instead a broader humanity which recognizes the brotherhood of all men and seeks toward international peace, then all our prayers will have been abundantly answered.

A Sign of the Times

PHILANTHROPY, in the broader meaning of the term, is a comparatively modern principle. It is true that there have been in all ages noble and great-minded men and women whose generosity to those who had been buffeted by misfortune or beset by poverty shone out like a bright light relieving the surrounding darkness. But they were exceptional. As a rule, the rich held on to their possessions unstintedly, and had little scruple concerning the means by which they were increased. Within a few generations past, a great change has come to many people of affluence. They have begun to realize that a man, after all, is only the steward, not the owner, of his material possessions, and that, soon or late, there must be an accounting. More and more is the moral responsibility of the wealthy coming to be recognized, and more and more is the warning of one of America's greatest millionaires becoming emphasized that "the day will yet come when it will be regarded as a disgrace for an American to die rich."

All gifts, material as well as spiritual, are entrusted to us for a purpose. They are the talents with which, if we view the matter right, we are expected to perform certain service for the Divine Giver, who has placed them in our keeping for that purpose. Not to be hoarded up or kept for selfish indulgence, nor to lead us to assume a vain superiority over our fellows, are we to be good stewards and kindly in generous deeds and for the furtherance of noble purposes. How can any one who has wealth far beyond his own utmost needs or the needs of those dependent upon him reconcile with the principle of stewardship a career that aims only to go on self-ishly heaping up riches, like the man pictured by Bunyan in the Interpreter's House, who raked the straws and refuse together, but did not lift his eyes to see the Shining One, who held a glittering crown above his head, which he might have grasped merely for the reaching?

These reflections are suggested by the news, published in the daily journals, that a great American millionaire has seen the light and has decided to apply a large part of his fortune to the solution of the problem of poverty. He has already given millions to churches, colleges and institutional work. Now, it is said, he will attack the larger problem of systematically aiding the multitudes who have been left behind in the great battle of life. At best, he can only hope to help a portion of the whole, for the problem of poverty is so vast as to be almost a hopeless one. But his example may stimulate others, and thus result in immeasurable good. Only when the spirit of Christ and his teachings pervades the whole world will poverty, want and suffering disappear, but if each of us does his and her share meanwhile in the alleviation of these evils, much will have been accomplished.

Ministers Under Arms

IT is reported that two hundred and fifty Protestant ministers of France are serving on battlefields, and that nearly all the Methodist ministers in Germany are under arms. On October 1, news came that the Rev. Frederick Roesch, a missionary to Algiers, representing the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Montclair, N. J., had been slain in battle. John R. Mott had said of him that he was one of the most promising missionaries of his acquaintance. The young pastor of a Presbyterian church in New Jersey resigned his pastorate to join an Australian regiment in which he was an officer, and is now fighting on the continent. Salvation Army officers of one nation are aiming rifles at brother officers of other nations with whom they have labored, side by side, for the conversion of souls.

In these facts the horrors of war appear at their blackest. Men whose souls are equipped with divine power for turning the people to righteousness, men whose minds are trained to teach spiritual truths, snatched from their sacred work and forced to become murderers of their brethren. Those who serve voluntarily do so from a high sense of duty, but, it seems to us, a mistaken sense. They can make vastly greater contribution to the world's welfare by continuing their works of soul-winning and spiritual instruction, and by insistently preaching brotherhood and peace, than by helping to slay their brethren of other lands. Those whom the hand of the law has thrust into this hated task merit our pity and our prayers. God grant that these days of battle may be brief, and that people and pastors alike may soon return to the sweet tasks of peace!

Making Religion Winsome

HOW often the hearts of mothers and fathers bleed over the fact that certain boys and girls of the household are unconverted! In many such cases no one could think of blaming the fathers or mothers for the spiritual wanderings of their children; but in other cases one can hardly help wondering if there have not been, on the part of these parents, some misconceptions of what real religion is, that have pushed their young people away from the divine life rather than drawn them toward it.

Here are a few simple suggestions for parents whose children are still outside the fold. They may be applied by all Christians who long to win their companions to the Saviour: (1) Be happy. "The joy of the Lord is your strength." If your religion does not make you happy, others will not want it. The German expression for what Christ does for the individual soul, the expression which in English is rendered "to save" is "to make happy." That is Christ's purpose: he saves us to make us glad. If we make others think he has failed in our case we cannot expect them to let him try his power upon them. (2) Be just, and honest, and true. Especially in dealing with your children, be straightforward and frank, scorning everything that approaches deception. Life holds no greater shock than that which comes to many a child on learning, for the first time, that his father's or his mother's word cannot be absolutely trusted. (3) Be kind. Kind in every way. Kind all the tim Be kind as a business. Be kind as a pastim Allow no lapses in your kindness. Even while y are being stern—though sternness in discipline not nearly so necessary as has been hitherto b lieved—make your children realize that back of t sternness is a terrific love that would die to he them. (4) Be free. Don't give the impressi that you are bound by a yoke. Jesus, it is tr did speak of a yoke of his, but he took great pai to say that it was an easy yoke. He said to h disciples: "I am not going to call you servan but friends" (John 15: 15). Freedom was almo the dominant note of Paul's preaching. Law all about us. In nature, in society, we cannot e cape from it; but when one becomes an intima friend of the Maker of all laws, natural, soci moral, spiritual, there is no longer any bonda about the law. And the spontaneous, liberated l of one who has been, indeed, set free by the power God's Son, will have power to draw others aw from the slaveries of selfishness and sin.

But, after all, there is only one rule, not fou nor forty, for becoming a winsome Christian. A that is to follow Jesus. Make it your business make manifest his life in your mortal flesh. (II Co 4: 11.) Let him shine out of your soul. Yo children will be stealing into your room in tim of perplexity or sadness, or of troubled conscienc and saying: "Father, do you think Christ can he me now?" And you will say, jubilantly, as Phil said to Nathanael: "Come and see."

Two Dogs Save Lives

TWO dogs in suburban towns saved the lives of five persons. Four were saved in one place from death by fire, by a Scotch collie, and one in another place from drowning in a well, by an Irish terrier. In Smithville, South Long Island, the home of Anton Busch caught fire about 2 A.M. when none of the family were awake. Shep, the dog, tried to wake Mr. and Mrs. Busch and their two children by barking, and when they paid no attention to him he ran into the bedroom and tugged at the bedclothes, and put his feet upon the body of his master, and they all rushed out to safety a moment before the burning stairway gave way. But for the warning of the affectionate and intelligent dog they would doubtless have perished in the flames. The other life saved was that of Stephen Doyle, of Eagle Rock Avenue, West Orange, N. J., who was gathering grapes from a vine wound about an oak tree. The ladder on which he stood fell, throwing him into a deserted well, but a protecting rock which he seized and clung to stopped his fall. Blarney, the terrier, saw his plight, and running to the kitchen, he made such demonstrations that Mrs. Doyle followed him to the well, and with a rope, which she then secured to a tree near by, aided her husband to the top. What love, service and salvation these faithful pets suggest. Their watchful love for their human companions raises the question, not in insolence, but in all seriousness:

Am I my brother's keeper? (Gen. 4: 9.)

Fifty Years' Service

FIFTY years of continuous service in the Treasury Department at Washington were completed by Francis Henry Goodall, the other day. Mr. Goodall served during the Civil War in Company G, 11th New Hampshire Volunteers. On September 17, 1864, he entered the Treasury Department as a first-class clerk in the second auditor's office. He held the position of chief of the division for the investigation of fraud, disbursing clerk, and other positions of responsibility under many auditors. He received a medal of honor for taking a badly wounded comrade off the field of battle at Fredericksburg under heavy fire, December 13, 1862. This veteran soldier and government employee is a graduate of Dartmouth College, and has always had a fondness for nature, having written several articles on the subject of flowers. The public owes a debt of gratitude to the modest, patient, constant men and women in the departments who do their duty so faithfully. They are as necessary to the success of the service as the members of the cabinet, or the President himself. As the government said to the brave young soldier who risked his life, and as it says in its gratitude to the faithful one of fifty years' service, so may the higher Master say when his journey of life is over:

Well done, good and faithful servant. (Matt. 25: 23.)

University Enrolment Very Large

THE enrolment at the great universities of this country is enormous. The highest education, and the extended courses of technical study embracing almost all professions and callings and even trades, has rapidly increased the university attendance. A number of the leading universities have from five to ten thousand students on their roll for this year. The war in Europe is keeping many of our young men at college in this country. Columbia University opened its 161st academic session with an enrolment of between twelve and thirteen thousand students in all the departments. It seems as though the people were believing in Solomon's words:

Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom, and with all thy getting, get understanding. (Prov. 4: 7.)

Hen Adopted by Pheasants

JOHN ROCKWELL, of Oxford, Mass., owns a Plymouth Rock hen that is at home among a flock of English pheasants. The hen was one of a brood of eleven hatched in the high grass back of the barn, which were a week old when the old hen brought them into the barnyard. The mother hen and her eleven chickens had the run of the pasture back of the barn, and they often fed within a short distance of a flock of eight pheasants. Two of the young chicks concluded that the monotonous life and companionship of the mother and brothers and sisters was irksome, and sought a wilder and freer life. The truants disappeared and were given up for lost till a few weeks ago, when Mr. Rockwell, going across a field, saw a flock and among them his two chicks that he thought had been eaten. One has since disappeared, but the other, now full-grown, is still with the flock and seems if anything wilder than the pheasants; for while persons can get within fifty yards of the pheasants before they start moving, the Plymouth Rock chicken keeps the farthest away and runs to cover first. Emphasis is put on the influence of heredity on life and character, and this factor cannot be too highly emphasized. And yet it is only one-half of the force necessary to habit and life. The other half is environment. It was the sight and contact of the pheasant life so near by that came over into the barnyard and took away into the flock of game birds the hen that, without their presence and example, would have lived a very happy life as a gentle pet in the barnyard. The circumstances, the companionships of life, have so much to do with the weal or woe, the development and destiny, of social and spiritual life. The apostle thus refers to this influence:

Be not deceived; evil communications corrupt good manners. (I Cor. 15: 33.)

PEACE MEETING AT GRANT'S TOMB

IT IS estimated that at least 25,000 persons were present at the peace demonstration at General Grant's Tomb in New York, Sunday afternoon, September 27. Besides these, there were perhaps 20,000 persons in 5,000 automobiles, which filed past the tomb in celebration of the occasion. The motor cars flew soft white pennants on which were inscribed the words of Grant, "Let us have peace." The exercises began with a sacred concert by a regimental band. Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reisner, pastor of Grace M. E. Church, offered a prayer for the recall of humanity, happiness, hope and love to the lands now scarred by fire, greed, hatred and malice. One thousand girls from the Washington Irving High School, each bearing an American flag, sang beautiful songs of patriotism and peace. Two young ladies bore a magnificent floral offering to the tomb. The choir of St. Andrew's Church, composed of 24 boys and 12 men, sang "Lord of Our Life," and "God of Hosts." Bishop James Henry Darlington of the Episcopal diocese of Harrisburg, Pa., then spoke a few words, asking that God's blessing might rest on the great audience and the cause, and closed with a prayer that the peace of America should spread to the tortured continent across the Atlantic. The climax of the meeting was the releasing of a pure white dove by Miss Dorothy Black. Taken out of a cage softly, the bird was set free bearing a motto of peace. It flew high and circled around above the tall buildings, and then went due east as though it desired to carry its message directly to the suffering nations of Europe, and still going east, it was lost to sight. Oh that in answer to the prayers of the American people, flying like white doves of peace over the Atlantic, the olive branch might be sent back as a pledge that the deluge of blood has ceased, as the dove in olden times came back with the olive branch as an evidence that the deluge by water had ceased. "And the dove came in to him in the evening: and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off, so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth." (Gen. 8: 11.)

THE RELEASE OF THE DOVE OF PEACE

World's Largest Tree-Trunk

A GIANT tule tree which stands in the little churchyard at Mitla, Mexico, is an object of interest to many tourists. It is said to have the largest trunk of any tree in the world. Its circumference at its largest point measures 145 feet. The ancient tree is reverenced greatly by the natives of that part of Mexico. The age of the tree is a matter of conjecture. The American Lumberman says it was a large tree when the Spaniards followed Hernando Cortez to the shore of Mexico, four centuries ago. Trees have always had deep significance in the literary, social and religious world. In olden times the heathen selected the old trees of ample shade as the places of idol worship. In the Far East today the missionaries often gather a congregation in the hollow trunk of a great tropical tree. The tree is constantly used in the Scriptures, old and new, as a type of spiritual truth. The prophet uses for this purpose a monstrous tree created by his imagination.

The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth. (Dan. 4: 11.)

Robbed Poor-Box

THE sexton of a Brooklyn church saw two men fishing coin out of the poor-box, and called a policeman, who arrested them. They had put shoemaker's wax on the end of a stick, and had extracted ten dollars in coin. A man does not have to fish with a waxed stick in a church poor-box for coin to rob God. There is a politer way to defraud him: to steal his holy day; to withhold from him what we owe him in physical, mental and moral faculties; in making a poor accounting of our use of time, opportunity and service which have been entrusted to us as his servants; and in our failure to contribute the necessary funds for the carrying on of his work. The prophet asks this very pointed question, and then answers it promptly:

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. (Mal. 3: 8.)

American Woman's Benefaction

MRS. FRANK LESLIE died in New York City at the ripe old age of eighty-one. Upon the death of her husband, of nation-wide fame as a publisher, whose business was in a tangled condition, she took sole charge, to the minutest detail, and in a few years had brought order out of chaos, and a fortune out of bankruptcy. It is said that in her will she has made a most generous gift to the cause of female suffrage, of which she was an early and enthusiastic champion. If Mrs. Leslie shall have left money to aid her companions in perpetuating a work of patriotism and benevolence so near to her heart, she will have followed the example of the apostle who said:

And I entreat thee also, true yokefellow, help those women which labored with me in the Gospel. (Phil. 4: 3.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

SEÑOR CARDOZO, UNITED STATES CONSUL J. R. SILLIMAN, UNITED STATES MINISTER FULLER AND GENERAL CARRANZA IN CONFERENCE

DETTING TOGETHER IN MEXICO. Generals Carranza and Villa with scores of sword hilts are negotiating a lasting peace for Mexico in the process of elimination. Carranza eliminating Villa and Villa eliminating Carranza from the list of governmental possibilities. It is asserted by both these leading Constitutionalists that on those to the city can a new revoluand prize contest on the evening of October 28, if present plans do not miscarry. This event will be one of the scattered features of the commercial tercentenary celebration which has been going on almost unobserved for some months. A committee of prominent automobile men is making the arrangements, which include a place for every class of motor car. New York State owners of cars may have opportunity to vote for king and queen of the pageant: $5,000 will be distributed in prizes to cars in the parade.

IZAAK WALTON NO LEGISLATOR. The attempt begun some six years ago after much agitation to regulate the taking of fish from the boundary waters between Canada and the United States apparently has failed, the treaty which was drawn up at that time providing for a joint commission on control matters, not having met with the approval of the United States because of objections by lake fishermen. Canada ratified our government two years ago that the Dominion would disregard the principle of joint regulation unless the United States approved the treaty, and as that does not appear to be likely, the whole question reverts to settlement by ancient methods to the fishing fleets of the two countries. Coincident with this development (backward) comes the annual meeting of the American Fisheries Association at Washington, when Secretary Redfield of the Department of Commerce addressed, urging among other things that Congress should provide for a national fish doctor or commission to determine the edibility of the national fish diet.

REVENUE CUTTER MEN HAVE ADVENTURE. On September 21, the United States revenue cutter Tahoma went on a reef ninety or more miles west of Kiska Island, one of the Aleutian chain, and her officers and crew, numbering about eighty, were obliged to put off in whaleboats and make for the nearest other island, some forty-five miles away, where they were picked up by one of the several vessels which went to the aid of the Tahoma upon receipt of a wireless S. O. S. call transmitted from the cruiser Buffalo by a Japanese liner. Sixty of the men are known to have been picked up by steamers, and the remainder are believed to be safe on near-by islands where search is being made for them.

FROM PULPIT TO BATTLEFIELD. Word has been received of the death in battle of the Rev. Dr. Frederick Roesch (lieutenant in the German army), missionary pastor in Algiers from the First M. E. Church of Montclair, N. J., while leading a company of his troops at Verdun, Belgium. The United Free Church Presbytery of Galashiels, Scotland, has granted leave of absence to the minister of St. Boswell's for the period of the war, being the first instance, it is said, in one hundred and fifty years or more in which an ordained Scottish minister has been released from his charge to fight in defense of his country.

USEFUL PANAMA CANAL RELIC. The old French ladder dredge Badger has been condemned on account of a defective hull. The Badger was built in Belgium in 1886, and was operated in the Pacific entrance channel by the second French canal company, and afterward beached. It was recovered by the Americans and rebuilt at the Balboa shipways in 1908 at a cost of $58,624.50. It has been operated in the Pacific entrance almost continuously since that time, with the exception of about four months of work in Culebra Cut. The old hulk may be used for a boat landing at Balboa. Its sister dredge, the Marmot, which has had a similar history, is still at work in the cut. From the Canal Record.

PIONEER MAIL-ORDER MERCHANT DIES. Richard W. Sears, founder of Sears-Roebuck & Company, Chicago, died at his country home in Wisconsin on September 28, aged 51. In 1884, while a telegraph operator, Mr. Sears conceived the idea that resulted in the great establishment which earned him a fortune of $75,000,000. He began business with a few watches, and retired a few years ago one of America's successful men. His success due, his friends state, to honesty, courage, modesty and knowledge of human nature.

CAN'T BEAR WASHINGTON'S FALL CLIMATE. Congress appears to be in a state of indecision on the matter of a brief vacation over election time, actual adjournment being desired by some, and a series of recesses that will bridge the period from October 10 to November 15 being favored by others. The Alexander ship purchase bill is the stumbling block over which Congress may trip in any hasty exit from the capital. The only other pressing legislation is the war tax measure, which is by no means having smooth sailing. The President is understood to have his mind fixed on the passage of a lapping bill before Congress adjourns.

SAVED $23,000,000 AT ONE CLIP. On September 29, the Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Bill as returned to the House by the Senate and carrying a lump appropriation of $20,000,000 (instead of $63,000,000 as originally drawn) was passed by the House of Representatives without a roll call, after energetic efforts by members in favor of the larger appropriation to amend the measure. The bill will now go to the President for his signature.

WORLD'S HEAVIEST PAY ROLL. Economists who have engaged their talent in computing the probable cost of maintaining the armies of Europe in the field, declare $22,000,000 a day to be a conservative figure, which would mean that the first six months of the campaign would entail an expenditure of four and a half billion dollars. The basis of this estimate is taken from the Balkan War, which cost an average of $2.50 per soldier. This colossal guess covers only the actual maintenance of the fighting "machines," and does not include the loss of wages sustained by individuals recruited for the war.

THE SIN OF JUDAS

Jesus and Judas

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

JUDAS' controlling sin was avarice. Its colossal consummation was selling Christ. Our Lord once remarked that Judas had a devil. John seemed to be the only one of the disciples who fully perceived this fact; for, when Judas murmured at Mary's waste of the expensive ointment, anointing Jesus' feet, John wrote, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief and carried the bag.

Judas no doubt became one of the twelve in order to secure office and emoluments. When he saw that there was to be no temporal kingdom, he planned the arrest of Christ. At the Last Supper Jesus, unwilling to endure his treachery longer, exclaimed, "One of you shall betray me." Judas, hiding his treachery, said, "Lord, is it I?" Christ replied, "Thou hast said." Then, Satan entering into Judas more fully, the traitor went immediately out, "and it was night." Night in his heart; night in his future, black with assassination gloom, which was about to plunge him in still deeper darkness. As he met the chief priests, his question was, "What will you give me?" Then he bargained to betray his Master for about eighteen dollars.

As Judas led the mob toward Gethsemane, he met his Lord, having just arisen from the agony of his prayer, with the drops of bloody sweat streaming down his face. He exclaimed, "Hail, Rabbi!" With his poisonous lips and serpent tongue, he indicated the Nazarene with his kiss of hypocrisy. Jesus, loving the traitor to the last, whispered, "Friend, wherefore art thou come? Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" And, turning to the bloodthirsty crowd, Christ said, "Whom seek ye?" They answered him, "Jesus, the Nazarene." Jesus replied, "I am he."

When the disciples knew that Jesus would not let them fight to protect him they all forsook him and fled. Only Judas remained, but he was standing with their enemies. He waited till they bound him. They tied his hands roughly together; hands that had touched the dead into life, and the blind into sight, that had blessed little children and soon would bleed for men.

What an awful contrast! Jesus hangs on Calvary's cross; Judas, on the other side of the city, hangs on a blackened tree. The innocent Saviour! The guilty betrayer! Jesus with the burdens of the world's sin on his bosom; Judas with the weight of treachery on his soul. Jesus paid the debt of the world's sin by his own self-sacrificing love, in suffering. Judas pays the wages of his own sin in death and banishment.

Judas and Peter both sinned, but one turned away from Calvary to the Pharisees and perdition, while the other wept tears of penitence, and came back to Jesus. So David and Saul sinned, but looked in different directions for pardon. Christ's look of love hardened Judas, but softened Peter.

Traitors are forever execrated. Nero betrayed humanity; Benedict Arnold his country; Judas his Christ, but to betray with a kiss of friendship is the depth of horror. It is the darkest deed on the annals of the universe.

Would it not be well for us to say, "Lord, is it I?" The possibility of a moral Vesuvius lies in the depths of every human heart.

Let us imagine Judas soliloquizing: "After he has washed my feet, I will run on errands for the devil. When the sacred Supper is over, I will consort with murderers for his overthrow. When the money for the sale is in my bag, I will lead the persecutors to him. When I kiss him, they will seize him, hold him fast, bind him, crucify him!"

The soliloquy continued after the light of eternity flashed upon his guilty soul. "I have betrayed innocent blood. I have loved the silver of this world better than the gold of Jesus' love in heaven. I will cast these thirty coals of fire, which are scorching my hands, on the floor of the temple, but this gives me no relief. They are burning still, in unquenchable flames of judgment, torturing my conscience.

"Where'er I fly is hell;
Myself am hell.

"I must hurry to my own place. I will hide in hades; I cannot bear the faces of my friends. I will hang myself, and have for my monument of infamy a potter's field of death."

Dante, in the Divine Comedy, as translated by Longfellow, puts into the mouth of Judas these mournful words:

Too late! Too late! I shall not see him more
Among the living. That sweet, patient face
Will never more rebuke me, nor those lips
Repeat the words: "One of you shall betray me."
Have I offended so there is no hope
Here nor hereafter? That I soon shall know.
O God, have mercy! Christ, have mercy on me!

THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, October 25, 1914. Jesus and Judas. Matt. 26: 14-25, 47-50; 27: 3-10. GOLDEN TEXT: "Woe unto that man through whom the Son of man is betrayed!" Matt. 26: 24.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"The Son of Man goeth, even as it is written of Him; but woe unto that man through whom the Son of Man is betrayed! Good were it for that man if he had not been born."

What a blessing it is to have been born into this world, for those who make the right use of the brief span of human life! It is our one chance of discovering what God's love is when it comes in contact with sorrow, pain, sin and death. Had we not been born, i. e., if our spirits had existed, or been called into being, in the sinless, sorrowless, deathless life, with no knowledge of this world, we should have missed our wonderful experiences of the grace and love and strength of Jesus. It is the battlefield that reveals the leader; the storm that unveils the nobility of the captain; the hospital that manifests the skill and resource of the great surgeon. How glad we should be to have shared these earthly experiences by the side of Jesus! To have fought and bivouacked with him, is to know him as angels cannot; and all this has given us the chance of ennobling our character and gaining the rewards of faithful service. Ah, it will be a bitter retrospect indeed, for any of us to forfeit, as Judas did, the mighty opportunities of this human life!

What Is a Traitor?

By Arthur H. Howland

A TRAITOR is a man who helps the other side. In these terrible war days the idea of a traitor is very clear-cut. A French soldier who would help the Germans; a German soldier who would help the French, the English or the Russians; any soldier who would help a nation with which his own nation is at war would be a traitor.

Jesus has a definite campaign of action on the earth. He is trying to do certain specific things. He is a captain, a king, assembling and leading spiritual and moral forces to attack definite wrongs and errors. He calls upon his followers for complete loyalty to himself and to his ideals. To be disloyal to him or to his ideals is to be a traitor. "Lord, is it I?"

Now, there are a lot of things about which the opinions of Christians differ, things upon which the program of Christ, as we know it, does not take positive ground. These are among the "non-essentials," of which Paul wrote, telling his readers to follow their own consciences in such matters and not to judge those who feel differently. But there is a great "drive" to the movement of Christianity, as led by its captain—certain great principles and customs and ideas it antagonizes, certain others that it upholds and forwards, and here the Christian must either be loyal or become a traitor.

Christ taught love. That is the atmosphere and aim of his army. Indeed, that is what makes at seem so strange to speak of Christ's forces as an army or to use military terms in describing their work. For an army means hate! But Christ and his army mean love.

Any Christian who is disloyal to the principle of love is a traitor. He has no option about being kind and helpful. He must be. That is what it means to be a Christian. The world has the other spirit, and it is that spirit that Christ came to overthrow. We cannot fight on both sides. We must follow our Shepherd King—"the King of Love."

But even more fundamental than love is justice. The love emphasized in the New Testament is not a flabby, wobbly, sentimental thing. It is sturdy, straight, based on the deepest and steadiest principles of reason and justice. Yet organizations and individuals, calling themselves Christians, are occasionally found to be not only unkind, but unjust, dishonorable. Such an individual or organization is a traitor to Christ, a Judas.

Again, Christ stands for a unique ideal of religion, or piety, or worship. Some people talk as though it were enough for a Christian to be just and kind. But Christianity means far more than that. We must not forget, in zeal for social welfare and reform, that the essence of religion, as Christ taught and personified it, is personal communion with God. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart"—that he declared to be the first commandment. What mean the dull prayer-meetings, the dumb lips, the joyless hearts so common in the modern church? Why is the new church so different from the church of Pentecost, with its fire of testimony and prayer and power? Why? Because we have forgotten Christ's emphasis, Christ's purpose of bringing human souls into direct touch with himself, and so with God. And to the extent that we are negligent of real spirituality, or opponents of it, we are traitors to our leader and his plan.

In many other ways we may be disloyal. But, thank God, we do not need to be disloyal at all. Christ's plan brings with it the power to keep all his followers who will yield themselves without reserve to himself, true to love, true to righteousness, true to God.

Echoes From the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

THE kings and high officials of Europe, when they meet, always embrace and kiss each other, no matter what their relations have been in the past or may be in the immediate future. This is a kiss of respect. It may be given on the lips, the cheek, the brow or the beard and is nicely adjusted, according to the age and rank of the giver. From this close personal contact it passes through many forms: kissing the hand, parts of the clothing and even the ground trodden upon, according to the idea of respect or fear inspiring the one who performs the act.

The nations of the West have not adopted this ancient custom as a form of salutation, but have reserved it for the more tender relationships of life.

The Bedawin in his tent greets his guest, even though an utter stranger, by this form of salutation and further seals his friendship by breaking bread or eating salt with him. After this the life of the stranger is as safe as that of the Bedawin himself. Any violation of this sacred custom is looked upon with contempt and horror and is almost unknown.

The first time I ever visited the city of Jerusalem I called on a dear old lady for the sake of her son. She greatly surprised me by rising up suddenly and kissing both my eyelids because I had so recently seen her boy. An old servant who lived in our house for many years kisses me on my shoulder. A respected Moslem friend kisses me on the cheek. The little child daily kisses the hand of his father and in certain well-trained families the sons observe this custom as long as the aged father lives. The pupil kisses the hand of his teacher, the servant, of his master.

Judas Iscariot was a chosen disciple of Christ, he was a pupil, a guest, a friend. He dwelt with him, ate with him, he met with him for communion and prayer and finally in that garden of hallowed memories betrayed him by a salutation of the most sacred intimacy—a kiss.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Q. Where can I secure the books mentioned in your article on social life in the Sunday School?

A. All these and other books mentioned can be secured through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Q. In starting work for parents in the Sunday School should we have both fathers and mothers in the same class or should it be started for mothers only?

A. I would begin the work with a class for the mothers of the youngest children. Organize the class, give it a name, have a pin or button and some good objective to work for. After that work for a class for the mothers of the Primary, then one for the Juniors' mothers. And when the little ones are promoted, promote the mothers to the next class and start a new one in its place.

Of course have a class for fathers, but a separate one. However, you can sometimes have a successful parents' class for both fathers and mothers. In the Moody Sunday School of Chicago there is a parents' class formed of the younger fathers and mothers, the babies being taken care of during the lesson in the Sunday school nursery and kindergarten.

Q. The Greene County Sunday School Association holds a series of conventions during the year for the benefit of the rural Sunday schools. One of the subjects for discussion is adult class activities and conferences. Will you please make suggestions and give us some ideas upon these subjects that will be helpful to us?

A. There are three splendid books full of suggestions for such discussion. "The 'How' Book" (Hudson). "The Adult Worker and His Work" (Barclay). "The Adult Bible Class" (Pearce). Your State Association secretary should have several leaflets of this suggestive sort for free distribution. Write him. Ask him also to send you copies of the leaflets by

THE SUFFERERS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

OUT of the smoke of the cannon that rages,
Out of the hail of the bullets that fly,
Out of the ashes and dust of the ages,
Rises the sound of the harsh battle-cry.

Out of the fields with their harvest of dead men,
Out of the forests made gloomy with fear,
Rises the wail of the widow and orphan,
Asking again for the home made so drear.

High on a throne they have placed Death, the Reaper,
In his mailed hand is the sword, dripping red;
"I am my brother's protector and keeper,"
Glows on a shield that hangs over his head.

Low in the dust at his feet kneel the widows,
Giving their tribute of sorrow and pain,
Sobbing their prayers o'er the bodies of children—
Hot are the tears that are falling like rain.

Heroes are made in a minute when dying,
Men do brave deeds by the dozen—the score—
But of what help is the courage that, flying,
Drives not the wolf from the lone cottage door?

Where is the comfort that comes from the knowledge
That a whole nation will honor the dead;
When women's faces are shrunken and tear-stained,
And baby voices are asking for bread?

the event of war, the onus thereof, in all senses, would fall on them, as the radical element in Italy, as in some other countries, while it excels in talk, is nearly always found among the missing when it is a question of the serious work which often is the result of its over hot-headed talk and ill-considered action.

So many people do not seem to have any very clear idea of what a so-called "White Paper" or "Orange Paper" really is, and appear prone to ascribe to it both an authority and importance and above all a completeness and impartiality that it does not possess, that a few lines on this subject will perhaps not be amiss.

The name of these papers is derived from the binding in which they are placed. Thus, English and German official papers, treating of foreign affairs, are bound in white; Russian, in orange; French, in light blue, and the United States in red. The papers, or books, are then called Red Book, Blue Book, etc., etc.

The contents consist of such excerpts from the correspondence of the particular government on the particular subject, as the issuing government thinks will bolster up the thesis which the issuing government thinks is right. It does not contain the entire correspondence, never has, and probably never will. So that it is really a piece of special pleading, with very often all the arguments and propositions of the other side left out. Its historical value is only that what documents and correspondence are printed, are authentic, but to base a judgment on a white book is simply childish. The complete record of the negotiations and correspondence preliminary to this war will in all probability never be made known, either to this generation or the next.

From personal experience, I know that the English archives, after 1830, are today not open to the historical writer or student, and the Archives Nationales, at Paris, do not allow the complete dossiers of any subject dated after 1800 to be examined.

The Vatican contains in its archives the explanations of more secrets, perhaps, than do any other archives in the world. That of the Iron Mask is known to be there, but the authorities will not allow any examination to be made of the so-called "reserved documents." I have worked in these places on historical researches, and my assertions are based on my personal experiences—and I had pretty good influence exerted on my behalf.

The battle of the Aisne, or rather the series of combats along a line a hundred and fifty miles long, to which this name is conventionally given, is still being fought. I have intentionally postponed the discussion of this battle until the very end of this article, in the hopes that there would be some definite facts on which a deduction concerning its termination or its results could be intelligently or even reasonably founded; but there is nothing. The battle has now continued for twenty days (to the afternoon of October 3), and equals in point of duration the battle of Mukden in the Russo-Japanese War, which has heretofore held the record as the longest battle in the world's history.

In point of numbers engaged, the battle of the Aisne is far more important than the battle of Mukden, but in point of historic and strategic importance Mukden is far more significant. The battle of the Aisne will settle nothing, no matter which way victory finally inclines, whereas Mukden settled the war virtually.

England's East Indian troops landed at Marseilles on Friday, September 25, two divisions of infantry and four brigades of cavalry. This has added some 70,000 to the Allies' forces. I think that the following is a nearly correct estimate of the strength of the forces now on the line of battle:

ALLIES
English expeditionary force	175,000
English East Indian force	70,000
French regular troops of the line	900,000
French irregular troops, Turcos, Colonial Infantry, Senegalese, Foreign Legion, etc., etc.	75,000
Total allied force	1,220,000
GERMANS
Fourteen army corps	612,000
Ersatz reserve and volunteers	200,000
Total German force	812,000

In other words, the Allies have an advantage of near three to two.

These Indian troops are part of the large reinforcements, no doubt, which have been mentioned in the German official bulletins. It is difficult to see, however, where any further reinforcements of any moment for the Allies will come from in the next sixty days. It is hardly to be expected that the green Canadian troops will be thrown forward immediately on their arrival in Europe, nor is it probable that any of the newly levied troops in England proper will be sent forward within that time. Judging from the English papers of recent date there is no expectation that the newly levied troops will be ready to take the field much before Christmas.

As to the battle itself, but very little can be said with certainty, and, in fact, I am obliged, with some other writers on the war, to confess myself totally unable to harmonize the optimistic general statements contained in the bulletins issued by Paris and London with the positions of the places these two bulletins give as their successive advanced points.

The positions of these places on the map indicate neither advances nor a successful enveloping of the German right wing, but rather the reverse.

The map I use is the map issued by the general staff of the United States army, and is supposed to be the most authoritative procurable, so I do not think there is any error in the locations of the places.

THE INTERRUPTED TASK

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER JR.

I WAS quite tired, sitting there in the center, and I was eating under a crab-apple tree with a pad and pencil, thinking fiercely. It's easy to think wonderful thoughts, and to write them, too, when the sunshine rips up generously in a sapphire-lined sky, and the yellow butterflies drift from one clump of purple asters to another, and the wind hums like a living reed, over a bed of clover. I was thinking an fairy language when a crab-apple—a wonderful, ruddy fellow, not the unfortunate, hard crab-apple—fell on my head with a thud that knocked every day-dream far away, and left only a dull hurt in its place.

I looked at the crab-apple, lying red and unobservable in the warm sunlight, and wondered I could not ascribe blame for the destruction that had done to my train of thought. It was so round and pretty. But when I took up my writing again the bright hair faded from my vision, and my words were jumbled and confused. And, although the leaves were just as beautiful, although the sky was just as blue, I sat gazing past them out of [illegible] and when the chill came my hair was still unbrushed.

Very little things decide great matters sometimes. A carelessly flipped match cast me to a city; and a pink satin slipper by over a solid, gilt-edged street. A small child ran plunge contrast into war, and a new wrinkle in the earth's surface can make a mountain rise out of the sea. And all of these things come so suddenly that folk, looking past the small cause of the trouble, insist it's the way of life.

Some people say that they were born unlucky, that they are pawns of fortune, that their fates have fallen from the beginning, because of the little, inconsequent things that occur them.

I know the story of a girl of long ago, who lived in the time of my great-grandfather. She was a great belle who danced and sang and coquetted through the daytime hours, and half of the night. Many men married her, and so [illegible], be it a duel, or a hunting bee, or a house party, or a grand ball, was considered complete without her. She was called "the toast of the town."

This girl had a horse, a thoroughbred horse with a skin of satin and a mouth of velvet. She was proud of her horse and would often steal away from the others in riding through the country for a long afternoon. It was after one of these rides that she met the little thing that changed her whole life.

Some school child or boy may know but confusion or rose bush and dropped a sheet of smooth white paper on the dull brownness of the road. She had passed on, unconscious, and the paper had stayed there, resting in the light wind. It was only by the time, with its beautiful color, caught down the road. It was a playful, warm little breeze—like such a lot naughty, and the paper sail fluttered up and down softly across the [illegible] pavement. [illegible] Then was a frightened snort, a rush, and the horse leaped [illegible] trampled little bags in the road.

The [illegible] her face, [illegible] an hour later. Her beautiful hair was dabbled with blood from an ugly cut, and she lay many days when they carried her to an improvised stretcher. They took her home and put her into a bed of pain and mental torture. It was months before she left it.

Doctors were not as skilful in those days as they are now. Perhaps in this time of marvelous efficiency the girl would have been completely cured, but when she was at last carried in an invalid chair, she was disfigured by a scar that puckered the side of her face, and her left foot—the dainty foot that had danced its way through [illegible] had been amputated. It was a bitter, maddening woman that they brought back to life.

The girl was proud, and no one blamed her when she suddenly moved away from the gay town to a lonely stretch of prairie on the frontier. No one would care to leave the pits of the world when they had been "the toast." She moved far from the familiar scenes, and nursed her grievance against God and God's own waste places.

There were Indians in those days where now there are cities, and automobiles, and thundering railroads. And the girl, [illegible] weary of life to be interested, one day made friends with an Indian woman who came to her cottage door to sell baskets. More in a spirit of indifference than anything else, she began to learn the language of the shy, sometimes hostile race that lived so near to her door yard. It was only a matter of time before she shook off her indifference, and then grew interested, and at last enthusiastic. She started a school for children, and a sewing class for the girls; she taught the first principles of medicine, and the most beautiful facts in the history of Jesus. And, as she taught, her eyes grew brighter, and her laugh bubbled out again, and her heart grew light.

I never heard the name of this lady, or the town where she lived, or the place where she learned to do God's work, but although I have no proofs I cannot help being sure that the story is true. For it is a beautiful story, and if you look through life you will find out that most of the beautiful stories are true. It seems almost miraculous to us to know that a tiny thing like a sheet of paper could change a dull woman to a willing instrument of God!

So many people have their careers changed in a large way, or in a small way, by some little thing. Milton did not groan and refuse to live because of his blindness—he went on and wrote masterpieces. Fanny Crosby has charmed up the lines of thousands of millions—although she herself cannot see God's sunlight, and there are thousands of brave folk in desolate places doing their best under all circumstances.

To friends of mine, if something—something little or big—looms up [illegible] in the horizon of your life, do not look past it, past the world, with a dull look in your heart and with folded hands. Try to see God's message in it, the message that he is sending to you, for if you should fail to read it, sometime, you will find you with your task unfinished.

AN OPEN LETTER TO AMERICAN BUSINESS MEN

This is not a time for alarm, but for calm, deliberate judgment and foresight. The whole world has been thrown out of gear, in commerce, industry and finance, by the great war. Manifestly, it is a time of broad and radical readjustments.

There are four underlying conditions that give courage.

First:

The new Currency Law, which is just on the point of becoming operative. The Federal Reserve Board has been created, the Federal Reserve centres located, and this whole scheme of sound and elastic currency is ready to stimulate trade, commerce and manufacturing.

Second:

Our great crops. These amount to hundreds of millions of dollars, beyond the needs of our own consumption, and the government is already working out plans by which the crops can be sent to the warring nations that need them.

Third:

The currency and the crops join in enriching our enormous home market, and it is now spread ready for the harvest before our American manufacturers, with little or no competition. It is an unprecedented commercial situation.

Fourth:

The Panama Canal is now open for traffic, making both coasts of South America more accessible for our American manufacturers.

These four conditions combine to make an opportunity that has not been equaled in the lifetime of any man now living. To lose heart is to lose ground. It is not only self-interest, through building up individual fortune and strength, but patriotic interest, in building up the commercial supremacy of America, that unite in urging all manufacturers and business men to move forward.

Business Executives, with marketing problems, are offered the combined knowledge of forty-three national periodicals. Co-operation will very gladly be given in an effort to help our American industries along the lines of market analyses, national sales facts, etc., etc. Address:

THE CALL

BY ALICE GARLAND STEELE

HIS name was Samuel Barnes, and he had heard it first as a child, when his mother, pondering it in her heart with other things about him, had likened him to that other small Samuel in the temple. "Some day," she mused, "he will be hearing it from otherwhere—and he will go! He has strange destinies in his eyes."

She hung above him, through measles and chicken-pox, with utter disregard of his sturdy health. "It may call him now," she reckoned, and her heart was torn with anxiety, but he emerged from both, as boys will, with a need for longer knee-breeches, and an anxiety on his own account to harden baseball muscles that were dear as the apple of his eye!

He heard it again when he entered high school, and sat with serious, short-sighted eyes far into the night conning Latin. "A lot of good it will do him," sniffed his great-aunt Caroline; "he'll just have to go into the feed business same as his father did. Latin, my land!" And when he added the optional Greek to his course she merely judged him to be "cramming down another indigestible dead language!"

At sixteen it was still an indifferent matter to him what he was to become in after life. He had given himself up to his voices, much as a girl had in old Domremy a great many centuries before, and he got out of them, as she did, an exquisite idea that life was to be controlled for him in some wonderful way! A war would break out, and he would carry, like his grandfather, the colors of his regiment into the enemy's line! What matter if he fell, like his grandfather, with a red splotch on his temple?

Or, like Franklin, he might make a dash for the North Pole! Long years after, when Peary did it, he felt that the great man had only gotten ahead of him! Or he might, like Cotton Mather, translate the Bible for some race of copper-colored savages—or he might invent a new electrical turbine, or an air-machine that would have wings like a bird, or—or—

So they went on, indefinite, vaguely wonderful, the siren voices of his youth, luring him with high deeds still left undone in the world, of which only he should guess the secret formula!

At seventeen he went into his father's feed business, and stood it for six months, then he quit and ran away to sea! And his great-aunt Caroline cried, "Where is your Samuel now? His mother, through tears, had flashed her answer,

"God's temples are not limited to dry land, Caroline," and then had hidden herself to weep alone.

It was, he admitted to her later, an inglorious experience, and almost as bad as the feed business, but he emerged from it, as he had from the measles, with a need for still longer trousers, and a desire to do some grim fighting with the powers of evil as he had found them on his trip around the world.

He had learned at seven to take bitter medicine—he took it now, at nineteen, and went home, contrite and unhappy, with eighty dollars saved up to lay in his mother's lap along with his curly head. It may have been her voice that called him that time!

HE decided, one drowsy August day, that he wanted to study medicine.

"But why?" his father insisted, "when there is a business all cut and dried for you?"

He had answered with a flicker of a smile over his seriousness, "That's just it, sir—I'm cutting it because it's dry!"

What can you do with such a son?

He entered a School for Physicians and Surgeons. He had often kept small lizards and snakes of the field-variety in alcohol—now he substituted brains for the lizards, and for the snakes diseased bones and dead tissues, and they frightened his great-aunt Caroline almost as much. She was a member of the Anti-Vivisection Society, and she resented it when he practiced on guinea-pigs in the storm-shed; he had grown, however, dead serious at last, and he did not answer her back—he was too busy listening to the voices of Harvey and Jenner and a host of others.

He skimped on his allowance to root out rusty tomes from book-shops and to subscribe to advanced medical reviews, and when the Spanish-American War broke out he had just won his degree. This time with head erect he marched from home again, to take up work as a volunteer on a hospital-ship in Havana Bay.

He stayed till the war was over and the ship went out of commission, and came back with a deeper knowledge of yellow fever and of his own infinitesimal value as a member of the human race.

"But I'll make good, mater," he confided to his mother; "there are big stunts to be done for old Materia Medica yet—and that's why I don't want you to drag me around to call on girls with you. I want to keep free for the Call when it comes."

His family viewed him as lacking in all the social graces. "He can't talk to a woman without blushing and biting his tongue off," said his Aunt Kate, who was socially inclined and anxious for Samuel to marry money. "There's that Gordon girl, who lives on the Ridge—she could just make the boy. If he'd just go in for her and specialize on the throat and ear at the same time, in three years he'd wake up famous!"

Samuel, overhearing her, had interrupted rather brusquely. "Look here, Aunt Kate, just now I am specializing on rats as typhoid-carriers—we'll cut Miss Gordon out till I'm through with them, please."

He was lacking in the social graces. He cared at that time only for one thing: to be an honest seeker after a disagreeable kind of truth, and the rats in his tiny laboratory were one of the doors he had to go through, that's all!

But it was not until the day he started for Panama with the Canal Commission that he admitted himself at last full-grown—he had put away, with his mother's farewell kiss, forever the things of the child!

It was, medically, a splendid opening, some said, but others, knowing him better, decided he was not thinking of that; and a girl whose name was Janet Neale, and who was a friend of the Ridge Gordons, comforted his mother with an honest little catch in her voice that paid a tribute to the young M.D. the other woman did not lose.

"I think it is perfectly splendid," she said, "and he won't get yellow fever, dear Mrs. Barnes; he's just going to help cure other people of it. Think of it, having a son on the Canal Commission—aren't you proud!"

"Yes, my dear, and lonely."

"But—he'll come back." The girl, misty-eyed, was following the track of the steamer as it trailed down the bay.

His mother looked at her quickly and drew down her veil. Would he come back—and at whose call? She felt a sudden jealous wave which swept color into her pale cheeks, and then quietly she reached over and took the girl's hand. "I hope so, my dear," was all she said.

The Isthmus in that year had plenty to keep materia medica busy. Impure water, filthy streets, open sewage—young Dr. Barnes, viewing it

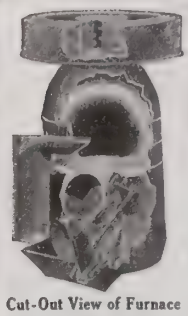
Saved ½ His Coal Bills For 8 Years



Cut-Out View of Furnace

With an Underfeed! Read this Proof!

Rockford, Ill., January 31, 1914

Gentlemen: Have had in use in my house for over eight years one of your Underfeed Furnaces. Will say in favor of same that it has given the best of satisfaction not only in the saving of fuel, which amounted to at least one-half annually, but in giving also the required amount of heat.

H. W. COYNER.

Are YOUR Coal Bills Too High?

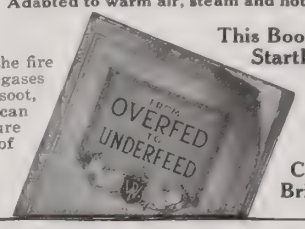
The one certain way to reduce coal bills one-half to two-thirds is by using an Underfeed furnace or boiler. Thousands of users have written us statements like these: "Coal bill $16.22 for seven rooms." "$5.40 to heat four rooms." "Reduced coal bills from $109 to $53." "Underfeed reduces coal bill 60%." "A great fuel saver." "Have cut coal bills $70 each winter for nine years." "Saved $122 a season." "I have divided my coal bill by five." "Even temperature, with no smoke or dirt."

WILLIAMSON NEW-FEED UNDERFEED Furnaces and Boilers

Cut Coal Bills ½ to ⅔

With the Underfeed, coal is fed from below. All the fire is on top, causing perfect combustion. Smoke and gases are burned up, making more heat with no smoke, soot, clinkers, smell and dirt and but few ashes. You can burn the cheaper grades of hard or soft coal and secure same heat as highest priced coal. Any size or kind of coal may be used.

No other furnace or boiler can compare with the Underfeed in securing clean, even, economical heat. Specified and used by the U. S. Government. Soon pays for itself. Adapted to warm air, steam and hot water.



This Book Will Startle You

This Coupon Brings It

50% Saving Guaranteed

Every Underfeed furnace or boiler is guaranteed to reduce your present coal bill at least one-half when properly installed and operated. This is the strongest guarantee ever put behind any heating system. It is backed by a $1,000,000 corporation.

Slash your big coal bills right square in two and get more heat by using an Underfeed. Start to keep the coal money in your own pocket by mailing in the coupon today. We'll send you furnace facts that will surprise you. (35)

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Your Vote*

Did you ever sit down to study deeply and thoroughly the question, who is responsible for the evils and injustices and wrongs of American civilization? Here we have at last a land in which the people can have precisely and fully what they want. No inside nor outside power can dictate to us.

Why, then, have we not a perfect civilization? Why do the same wrongs and vices deface our land that deface other lands where the people are not free?

We may name three great causes. First, Igorance. A ballot is a gift meant for a man who thinks. As a matter of fact, a man who will not think has no right to it. A ballot in his hands is as dangerous as a pistol in the hands of a child. The ballot has unlimited power. It makes the laws under which we live, by choosing the men who will make the laws. And a few million people, voting without thinking, will create laws that will crush and destroy them and their loved ones.

The second reason that things do not go better with us is that people of similar interests and convictions do not stand together. The people who desire right things really outnumber those who desire wrong. If the church people should stand together they could bring about practically any reform they chose to work for. If the working class would stand together it could get anything it might demand.

But the third thing is a graver fault than Ignorance and Division. It is a flabby conscience. It is not enough to think; it is not enough to stand together. We must stand together for the right, for what is fair and just, for what is pure and honorable. We must make no compromises with conscience; we should become impatient of the sickening delays in the triumphs of righteousness. We must pray before we vote, and while we vote, and must, by our vote, help to make America the nation God wants it to be.

Winning My Friend†

THE passages for our Bible study have been skilfully chosen. It would be good preparation for leading the meeting to write down these passages, word for word, especially those in the first chapter of John. Read this whole beautiful chapter, and then notice certain striking expressions in the verses selected.

The two disciples heard him speak (verse 37.) We are apt to expect too much mind-reading on the part of our unconverted friends. How will they know what we think of Jesus unless we tell them? Where would we have been if the only Christians we had known were dumb?

The second selection, verses 40-42, contains three of these striking expressions: "He first findeth his own brother," "We have found the Christ," "And he brought him to Jesus." What do these nearest us think of our profession of religion? What reaches these nearest friends is, after all, not so much the word of our lips but the word of our life. The little and big inconsistencies, the little and big hurts of impatience, the little and big unkindnesses—most of all the exhibitions of injustice or unfairness, these nullify and cancel anything we might say. "What you are," said Emerson, "speaks so loud that I cannot hear what you say." If we would win our friend we must find the way, through God's abounding grace, of getting rid of those things which deafen his soul to what we may say about Jesus. But Andrew, fresh in the faith, found his own brother Simon Peter. What he told him is significant: "We have found him." Not a philosophy, not a code, not an ideal—but a man, a friend, a person. This was the testimony of the apostles. We have found him. And after his resurrection that was still their cry: "He still lives, and is still our friend." Then Andrew did that practical, sensible thing: "He brought him to Jesus." Feeling and believing as he did, he could do nothing else.

Peter evidently came without argument. Nathanael stopped to question. Philip's reply was, again, practical and sensible: "Come and see." That is what to say to our friend who hesitates. Try it. Give Jesus a chance at your life. Let him demonstrate that he can do for you what he has done for us; let him prove that he is what we say: "Come and see."

Wesley reports in his diary that he went unwillingly to that little prayer-meeting on Aldersgate street, at which his heart became "strangely warmed" with the fire which through his life stirred England and made Methodism. Suppose those friends had not urged him that night to "come and see." Have you thus urged your friend?

The narrative from Samuel brings the lesson of sternness. Sometimes it is necessary to rebuke our friends. Nathan did not shrink, when necessity arose, from rebuking his friend, although that friend was the king himself. He told his parable of wrong and then said sternly: "Thou art the man."

The American City‡

WHERE do you suppose we should find Jesus doing the bulk of his work if he were on earth now in physical form? He stated his platform to the people of Nazareth (Luke 4: 18). Where in America would he find, in the greatest numbers, the poor, the broken-hearted, the bruised? Surely in our great cities.

And since the church is Christ's body she must be about her Master's business. In every good work then for the saving and helping of bodies, minds and souls she should be the leader. The church ought to be a positive, practical force not only to reform, but to remake our cities—that is, not to be content to rebuild on faulty principles, but to change the very principles which lie at the root of so much of the misery of our cities. A civilization which produces such a result as the American city with its high death rate, its unspeakable poverty, its armies of unemployed, its pools of vice, must have some fundamental faults. Christian citizens must labor and strive to get the principles and the spirit of Christ into the roots of our civilization. And so fast as this is done, the terrible fruitage of poverty, vice and anguish in our cities will disappear.

Settlement work, vacation Bible schools, city missions, open air, tent and shop preaching, these are among the methods added to the ordinary church services for the reaching of the souls of the city. Not only must we reform present conditions; not only must we strive to remake society; we must, by God's grace, get the power of the Gospel into the souls of poor and rich alike. "By the foolishness of preaching" the American city, with all its wealth and poverty, its wisdom and folly, may yet be saved.

You can help save a life by sending in your mite in aid of the "Silent Sufferers" of the Great War. Send it to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD today.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST ROBERT E. JOHNSON has recently conducted a tabernacle campaign in Osceola Mills, Pa., a town of twenty-four hundred, only twelve hundred of whom are Protestants. Many prominent men took their stand for Christ. After the first week it was necessary to enlarge the tabernacle; special trains ran from neighboring towns. Special nights were devoted to lodges, railroad men, miners, and others. At the women's meeting twelve hundred women attended dressed in white, preceded by a parade, representing many organizations.

—"TO URGE THIS great city and our nation to a speedy appropriation of real Christianity as the only perfect and effectual remedy for all our domestic, social, political and spiritual disorders, and for the bringing about of universal peace, now so greatly needed and desired." This safe, wholesome and promising platform is that adopted by Evangelist J. Henry Gramps, of Stone Arabia, N. Y., who has been visiting the churches, missions and pastors of New York in the interests of a more aggressive and consecrated evangelism. He has traveled widely, and many have been led, through his testimony and exhortation, to a deeper interest in the work of soul-winning. Mr. Gramps' mother, Mrs. Nancy M. Gramps, of White Plains, N. Y., is still living, at the age of eighty-four, a life of trustful piety, interested with him in all good efforts to bring the world to the Saviour.

—THE PHI TAU PI FRATERNITY at De Pauw University, Indiana, claims to be the only college society in this country which makes consistent Christian living a condition of membership. This includes not only a confession of Christianity, but membership in some Protestant church and willingness to take active part in religious meetings and to perform other duties when called upon. In addition to the highest of good morals, the members are expected to consider their personal appearance in matters of dress, cleanliness, etc., as important factors in reflecting an inner Christian life. On joining the fraternity the students declare their purpose to "seek to interpret each other and their environment in the terms and spirit of Christ's teachings."

Dr. Joseph Cook, "Fifty-eight Varieties—One Better," and "One Hundred Things an Adult Class Can Do."

Q. Do you favor holding Sunday school parades? Is not this too spectacular for Christian work?

A. There are several strong reasons for these parades:

(a) They express the social spirit of our religion.

(b) They promote acquaintance among schools of different denominations who otherwise would not know each other.

(c) They stand for a great national necessity—namely, religious and moral education—more needed than the education of the mind.

(d) They are a confession of Christ to the world and of our own enlistment as soldiers of the Cross, fighting for the establishment of a kingdom of peace, with the weapons of love.

(e) They are a demonstration of Christian unity and strength of which the community takes note and which vote-getters respect.

The great Brooklyn Sunday School Union parade, which for eight years has been an annual public demonstration of that city's Sunday school forces, is the mother of similar parades which are being developed in country and city the country over. Philadelphia, which a few years ago began with a parade of less than 50,000, on its fourth annual parade turned out nearly 100,000. The men's parade of 27,000 in the Organized Bible Classes in Philadelphia a few years ago was the occasion of highly favorable editorial comment in the public press.

The strength of the Sunday school movement and the service that movement is doing for the community and nation is not fully appreciated. It takes some such ocular demonstration of the Sunday school to awaken the community to the fundamental work of the Sunday school in the making of character. In the Orient the parade idea is very popular. During recent years Sunday school parades were held at Tokyo, Japan, with 12,000 assembled, and at Shanghai, China, with 10,000. This testimony to the growth and popularity of the Sunday school was very impressive to the Oriental.

That man has a lighter heart who has helped a little to lift the burden from some crushed mother in war-ridden Europe. Send that little today to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the war's widows and orphans.

Just Look at this, John—

—see what I've cooked so temptingly in our new

"SAVORY" Roaster

It makes a cut of meat, fowl, or fish far more appetizing because it roasts differently. Self-basting and self-browning. The virgin juices of the meat, which gather in the center of its oval bottom, arise in the form of steam and constantly condense and trickle over the roast, giving it that delicious, juicy, rich, meaty, savory flavor that one misses when the roast is prepared in ordinary roasters, which must be watched carefully and which require tedious, wasteful open basting.

The "SAVORY" Roaster makes a first-class roast from even a second-choice cut and requires practically no attention. Simply allow it to roast 15 minutes to the pound and it will do its part admirably. Ask your hardware or general store dealer for the "SAVORY"; it will serve you well.

FREE With Each "SAVORY" Roaster

With each Roaster sold, we furnish a copy of the "'SAVORY' Prize Recipe Book," containing excellent recipes and valuable information on how to buy and cook meats. The work of 110 practical American women. (If extra copies are wanted, send us your dealer's name and 2c in postage.)

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

"I WISH to acknowledge," writes K. A. G., of Latrobe, Pa., "what prayer has done for me in the restoring of my sight." N. J. D. writes from Moores Hill, Ind.: "My eyes are better, and other things which troubled me are coming right." M. Y. B. writes from Sycamore, Ohio: "Some weeks ago I wrote for prayers for healing from heart trouble. I desire to acknowledge an improvement." Mrs. L. A. N., of Hudson, Ohio, writes: "The Lord answered the prayer of my sainted mother, and restored me when all was given up."

Mrs. L. W., of Oswego, N. Y., writes: "A few weeks ago I requested prayer that my son and daughter be reconciled to each other and become converted. I wish to acknowledge that in answer to prayer God has, in an unexpected way, reconciled them." Mrs. I. C. S. writes from Lone Wolf, Okla.: "A few weeks ago I asked the Prayer League to join me in praying for the healing of my dear brother who was injured nearly one year ago while helping repair the pier at Bay City, Calif. He had grown so much worse that the best specialist of Los Angeles said he would live only a short time. Now he is able to be up and walk around some, gaining very fast." Miss A. M., of Ronan, Mont., writes: "I want to acknowledge God's love in sparing a dear sister. I did not know but what she might be taken from us and I asked him to spare her." Miss L. B. T. writes: "I wish to acknowledge answered prayer in the return of a dear friend and relative after an estrangement of years." Mrs. A. L. C. writes from Los Angeles, Calif.: "I desire to acknowledge a direct answer to prayer for a blessing on means to restore my health."

Mrs. O. T. writes from Canute, Okla.: "My daughter has just undergone a very serious operation. At the time there was a revival meeting at our schoolhouse, and when I received the telegram to come to her I asked the prayers of the church. Thank God he heard the prayers of his people. The doctors said they never had so serious a case do so well." D. S. B. writes from Newark, Ohio: "I wish to tell you what a wonderful help the Prayer League has been to me. Some time ago I made known two requests. One God did not think best to answer, but he gave me strength to bear the sorrow. My other prayer was answered, and I wish to express thanks both for the strength to bear sorrow and for the answered prayer."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

L. T., Clinton, Kan.; Mrs. A. A. P., Brooklyn, N. Y.; M. B., Tyner, Can.; Mrs. A. D. S.; Mrs. J. J. St. J., Red House, Va.; Mrs. A. P., Cococum, Cuba.

NOT DRUGS

Food Did It.

After using laxative and cathartic medicines from childhood a case of chronic constipation yielded to the scientific food, Grape-Nuts, in a few days.

"From early childhood I suffered with such terrible constipation that I had to use laxatives continuously going from one drug to another and suffering more or less all the time.

"A prominent physician whom I consulted told me the muscles of the digestive organs were weakened and could not perform their work without help of some kind, so I have tried at different times about every laxative and cathartic known, but found no help that was at all permanent. I had finally become discouraged and had given my case up as hopeless when I began to use the pre-digested food, Grape-Nuts.

"Although I had not expected this food to help my trouble, to my great surprise Grape-Nuts digested easily from the first and in a few days I was convinced that this was just what my system needed.

"The bowels performed their functions regularly and I am now completely and permanently cured of this awful trouble.

"Truly the power of scientific food must be unlimited." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Trial 10 days of Grape-Nuts, when regular food does not seem to sustain the body, works wonders. "There's a Reason."

WHAT 15c WILL DO

The little matter of 15c in stamps will bring you the Pathfinder for 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's Capital, for the Nation; a paper that gives all the news of the world and that tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 22d year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is at last. Send only 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in New Friends. PRAYER FOR MORNING

PURE as the air at break of day,
Oh, Christ, to thee I sing
A chant of praise, a joyful lay,
And early homage bring.

With cheerful ray, serene and clear
Rise thou within my heart;
Banish the clouds of doubt and fear
That all unbidden start.

Banish remorse, Lord Christ of mine,
And give me daily new
Thy love, thy joy, thy peace divine;
Thy strength to will and do.

Household Hints

Candied fruits are less expensive than jellies or preserves. It is not necessary to use the "pound for pound" method, as is generally supposed. The following is a well-tried recipe: Remove the skin from the fruit, cut in thick pieces, and drop into maple syrup and cook until semi-transparent. Skim out and drain. When thoroughly dry, the fruit may be packed in glass or earthen jars. It will keep indefinitely. Candy each fruit as it comes in season.

It is told of a very careful housewife who objected to dust caused by opening and shutting the heat registers, that she went down into the cellar, tested the furnace pipes, and marked each one with the name of the room to which it led. Heat could then be turned on or off either from the cellar or from the rooms upstairs. Another good result of this labeling was gained during periods of cold northerly winds, for the heat could easily be directed to whichever part of the house was most in need of it.

Largest Manufacturers and Distributors of Kerosene Mantle Lamps in the World

[illegible] in Cuba in 1901 [illegible] in 1904 they put it differently: "the mosquito [illegible]-yellow fever." Surely a big enough enemy to fight, but, oh, the [illegible] irony of him! The dark morass, the rank, weedy pool, the innocent green undergrowth, the bit of water left by God's own rain [illegible] swamped, an impudent sword spread to them all, to cut man's courage, like his feet, from under him, and then hack life away in red-hot splinters in three days, five, twenty—it mattered little if the mosquito struck the first time!

They said of young Barnes at the American Hospital at Colon that he seemed happiest when the wards were full. It was a piece of pleasantry that [illegible] and staff shared, but when the latter heard it he simply said "Stuff!" much as he had once said "Rats!" to his Aunt Kate, and went on with the examination of two Canal employees who had just been brought in with the fever. One of them died of it; the other, as he left a few weeks later, swung the doctor's hand—

"All up to you, Doc, as I didn't kick the bucket with poor Piper! I won't forget you watching four hours at a stretch over just one—no, sir! This Isthmus was a most miserable hole when I came into it a year ago, but I guess the United States knows how to do more things than just dig a canal. Uncle knows how to take care of the fellows that are digging it—that fetches me!"

The young doctor stared ahead of him. "It's what fetched me," he said, and went out without smiling.

He came down before long, with yellow fever himself. And when they put him to bed and looked grave over his ever-parked condition, he said grimly, "I don't intend to die of it—and it's a good way to gain knowledge first hand."

Sometime his name leaked into a big [illegible] went over the wires to New York, of the "victims of the atrocious conditions our men are fighting in the Canal Zone," and his mother fainted. The girl from the Ridge, Janet Neale, came two days after.

"It isn't true, Mrs. Barnes; oh, it isn't true! I came to tell you."

He smiled proudly. "My dear, my dear—I didn't think it would be that [illegible]—for him to prevent."

But the girl persisted, speaking with a rare firm courage. "Dear Mrs. Barnes, he did not die! At least he's getting better. I visited the hospital myself."

"You—visited?"

"Yes." A [illegible] stirred, and stirred it the incongruous way.

To that moment of relief [illegible] the mother read the unspoken thing!

[illegible] a few weeks later, he [illegible] letter for the Ridge girl to [illegible]. It is hard to surrender little things like yellow, but she was going to wait the Ridge girl—for her own sake!

"My dear, he is almost well again! [illegible] so happy!"

"Yes, I know."

"And he is wrapped up in his work here there."

"He is the kind that would be."

"My dear—I think—I am afraid he will never marry!"

They found each—Janet in the sunny Ridge [illegible], seeing life as [illegible] and photographs from Abroad. The girl [illegible], but she smiled with her eyes, there were "If he is happiest [illegible] this way."

His mother, saying quickly, kissed her and made the [illegible] "I should have liked one [illegible] dear!" It was [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] d a part of her from that hour.

At Colon June came, and July; they tried to send Dr. Barnes to the hills, but the epidemic was still on, the last to be put, in all probability, on record for the Isthmus. There was a great hegira; men refused to die for the sake of an inter-ocean canal; every steamer clearing for home ports was loaded to the gunwale.

Dr. Barnes did not go. With a depleted hospital force he worked over black men and white in the free wards, gulping down coffee, or striding to the docks in the sunshine when he got a chance. He was restless in those days of fever, and every once in a while the old far-away look crept back into his short-sighted eyes, but his arm swept like a flail at death and disease, and they said of him that he never took a rest.

The head surgeon called him one day into his office. "Hello, Barnes—there's something we've got to talk about. There's been a nasty outbreak in the Chinese quarters, back of town!"

"I'll go, if you like."

The head surgeon tapped thoughtfully on the desk with his spectacle case. "It will be dirty work, Barnes, and little credit—of a public kind. The place is just a fester."

"I'm not looking for credit, doctor."

The head surgeon measured his man. "I don't believe you are," he said; you're slaving like the rest of us for the sake of the work itself!"

Doctor Barnes frowned. "No, it's not that. Something urges me on. I'm just bound to go ahead with it."

"Well," said the head surgeon, "if something urges you down to that Chinese filth-hole, go ahead and clean it out. Take the assistance you need and report to me every third day—that's all, doctor."

Dr. Barnes, immaculate in white linen uniform, went with one assistant and two orderlies to the help of his yellow brothers. He stayed with them nine weeks, and got used to the smells and the crammed hours, day and night. He reported at the end of that time at the Colon Hospital, pale, with his eyes deep in their sockets, and his lips twitching with nerve-exhaustion.

"Well, I've cleaned up the place, doctor, but there's a little bill." He drew out an account book from his pocket. "I burned down two dives and closed up an opium joint, and they're going to sue us. And I put some niggers to work digging a sewer; we owe them for thirty days' labor."

The head surgeon stared. Then he nodded curtly, "I guess it's all right, Barnes; I'll present it to the Sanitation Bureau. How many cases did you [illegible]"

"Three—out of twenty-seven."

"You'll do." The head surgeon turned back to his desk, but young Barnes hung on.

"Doctor—"

"Well, sir?"

"The epidemic is about over?"

"What are you driving at?"

"I want to go home."

"Home—on furlough?"

"No, to stay. I've had a letter from my mother—"

"I see." The head surgeon was frowning at an idiotic Chinese paper-weight. "I see, but, Barnes, I hate to lose you!"

"I know, sir, one grows used to—"

"Tut-tut!" snapped the older man; "do you think I've time to waste on [illegible]? I suppose you are hiking off for a honeymoon, little practice in Brooklyn to start with—some girl!"

"That's it, sir—I want to marry."

"Humph—why don't you bring her out here?"

"It's a beastly place for a woman."

The head surgeon turned away with a [illegible] he had sent my wife from malaria eight months before. "All right, Barnes, go home, and good luck!"

Questions and Answers

S. I. Please explain what is worldly dress and what is not, and also whether it is right or not to wear gold, particularly if the gold ornaments are gifts from loved ones. Is it forbidden by I Peter 3: 3?

Let us bring this problem back to our never-failing test of love. Suppose some one whom you greatly loved were in need of food, or were ill, or in great distress which a message from you would relieve. You would make any sacrifice to send the food or the message, or to find the wanderer. This is the Christian's attitude toward life. He loves those for whom his Saviour died, and will make any sacrifice to serve them. But there are nearer circles of friends and more immediate duties of home and community life, and in these we must bear our part happily and helpfully. We have a right to look, or try to look attractive, and to please those who are near us. A Christian cannot, must not be extravagant, but he may dress correctly and tastefully. There is no sin in the wearing of ornaments as such; the only sin can be in placing one's thought on these rather than on spiritual things and in using money needlessly which could be spent in service for others. A Christian woman's dress does not need to be ugly; it simply should not be extravagant. Peter, in the passage you mention, links the wearing of gold with braiding hair and putting on apparel. He does not mean that any of the three are wrong, but that the thought and care must be on inner rather than on outward things. As for gifts of gold, many of these, such as wedding rings, for instance, are a precious part of the inner life itself, and their possession is a constant help in one's work. Do not get under bondage. The Christian is free to follow his own conscience in these matters. God wants us to be happy, beautiful and free. But all the time there will be in our hearts the tug of our brothers and sisters and the little ones who are in distress, and we will do what we can to save and help and cheer them.

Leader, South Dakota. Is it right for a Ladies' Aid Society to employ stage people to give entertainments in the church and for the benefit of the church, making a stage of the pulpit?

It is not likely that by "stage people" you mean professional actors and actresses on the theatrical stage, but professional entertainers, as elocutionists, impersonators, vocal or instrumental musicians, etc. Many churches adhere to what seems to be the only Scripturally sanctioned method of raising money for church purposes, namely, that of direct, voluntary giving. Gradually, however, the idea that certain church societies may legitimately "earn" money by arranging some social event or entertainment has gained ground, and in some cases it does not seem to hinder spiritual work. Then, too, the idea is growing that it is the duty of the church to meet and direct not only the spiritual but also the intellectual and social needs of the people. Lectures may very appropriately have a place in the program of the church, and there seems to be no reason why the best vocal and instrumental music may not also be rendered. Many churches are making extensive use of the motion-picture machines for educational and wholesomely entertaining exhibitions. Some denominations still have a strong prejudice against using the church edifice or auditorium for anything but purely spiritual functions and use a second building or the church basement for these other affairs. Others feel that God's house is also, by his choice, the people's house and that anything which ministers to the physical, mental, moral or spiritual welfare of the people may be given in it. We have not actually answered your question, but have indicated certain principles according to which each church can be guided by the conscience of its members to the wisest answer. Above all, a church should not be divided, and should ponder and pray about these questions till a fairly unanimous opinion has been reached. Also, spiritual life, power and work must be constantly kept to the fore.

A. F., Strathcoman, Scotland. 1. Gen. 4: 14 gives the lament of Cain when he was driven out, an exile and wanderer, after the murder of his brother. He was overwhelmed with a sense of the severity of the sentence, but there was no sign of penitence, no cry for pardon, no expression of regret or sorrow. It was the cry of a selfish soul about to be deprived of all its material belongings and driven forth into the wilderness. Cain was afraid that some of the kinsmen of Abel would find him and slay him in revenge. It is evident from various passages that the population had multiplied considerably since the expulsion from Eden, although the record in Genesis deals only with a few individuals until we reach the latter part of chapter 4. Jewish tradition says that Cain married his sister. 2. In Gen. 4: 23, the outburst of Lamech showed a proud and presumptuous self-confidence: "The boast of a bold, bad man, elated with the possession of arms," which his son Tubal-Cain had invented, and with which he had just found that he could take life at will. It cannot be determined whether Lamech was speaking of an actual occurrence, or merely asserting what he would do if opportunity offered. The translators, however, seem to agree that Lamech had already avenged himself on some young descendant of Cain who had wounded him, and that in this speech he was attempting to justify the homicide on the ground of self-defense.

M. E. R., Seymour, Mo. I have been reading an old "hand book" entitled The Inter-Ocean Curiosity Shop, published in 1880. The publication appeared annually. In this book appears an article under the caption "Washington's Dream," in which General Washington, while in winter quarters at Valley Forge in 1777, is said to have seen a vision in which the future destiny of America is revealed. According to the vision, America's last bloody conflict will be with the combined nations of Europe, in which America will suffer greatly, but will come out victorious. The vision, up to the present time, has been accurately fulfilled. Can you, through the Mail-Bag, give me any light on the subject?

We have never seen the publication mentioned, but possibly some of our readers may know of it. We would be glad to hear from any one who has preserved it.

Subscriber, Oxford, Ohio. You seem to have encountered an exponent of universalism, as the theories and beliefs you mention—none of which are new—are those of that church.

A. C. S., Newton, N. C. If your work is really novel and clever, you should be able to find a good market. Everything depends on merit. Try it first in your own State, which will give experience.

Mrs. E. A. L., Missouri Valley, Iowa, writes: "I noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an inquiry about an assurance as to conversion. This is a very serious matter. Many who are in the church, also those who are inquiring the way, would like a definite experience. Now, I will say that the greatest help to me was the reading of Henry Drummond's book, Natural Law in the Spiritual World. We see that the first desire of an infant is to eat; he is fed, then he grows. Just so with a babe in Christ. He hungers and thirsts after something, and can be satisfied with nothing less than God's Word, for as it is written: 'Every word that proceeds from God's mouth is food for the soul.' Now, when one finds in his heart a real love for God's Word and a love for church and prayer service, he may be quite sure he has been 'born of the Spirit.' Then for an assurance that he is growing or has grown in spiritual life he will find in his experience an anxiety for the salvation of those about him. Then will come into his heart the overmastering love for the human soul. Thus the assurance of his conversion is gained, after which doubts are gone, and he will exert himself to win souls to Christ."

Modesty prevents us from publishing very many of the extremely kind letters we receive from our readers. Occasionally, however, we feel some of these communications so hearty and cordial that others besides ourselves would enjoy reading them, as in the case of a letter from A. W. A., Gilbert, Ariz., in which the writer says: "We have been of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family for a good many years, and I do not know what I would miss more than the paper if it should not come to our home. I think without a doubt it is the greatest paper for the whole family that is published, for it gives news, training in the right kind of thinking, and so much information of different kinds on the Bible that altogether it is hard to beat. So as long as God gives us of his blessings we shall certainly have to give THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a place in our home. With a prayer that God may use it in a greater way than ever before, I am, etc." That is, and during all these years has been our prayer, that God may lead and use THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more and more in spiritual and humanitarian service for his glory and the good of our fellow men.

OUR COVER PICTURE. The cathedral at Rheims, France, is one of the most widely known for historic associations and great artistic beauty of architectural style and interior adornment; its hundreds of statues and exquisite windows being objects of undiminishing interest to tourists. This cathedral was begun in 1212 and has been the center of much ecclesiastical history. The structure has been damaged by the German bombardment of the city of Rheims, some claiming beyond repair, its many art treasures suffering also. The exact extent of the injuries has not yet been definitely determined.

All-Weather Treads

Should be on Every Fall Tire

Here is a tread which—when you know it—you will adopt for all wheels at all seasons. In fall and winter it's particularly essential.

It is an exclusive Goodyear feature. The tread is tough and double-thick. That makes it enduring and difficult to puncture.

It is flat and regular, so it runs like a plain tread. It causes no vibration. Yet it grasps wet roads with deep, sharp, resistless grips.

In these important ways, no other anti-skid on the market compares with this Goodyear All-Weather tread.

Other Things That Go With It

Here are three other features—all exclusive to Goodyears—which you get in No-Rim-Cut tires.

Our No-Rim-Cut feature, which we control. It completely wipes out rim-cutting.

Our "On-Air" cure to save blow-outs. We alone employ that, at an extra cost of $1,500 daily.

Our patent method for combating loose treads. It reduces this danger by 60 per cent.

Goodyears are more than quality tires—more than the utmost in fabric and formula. In addition to that, they combat your four chief tire troubles in these four exclusive ways.

That's why more men buy them than buy any other tire. And legions of new users now adopt them every month. You will always insist on them when you know their advantages, and any dealer will supply you.

GERMAN MILITARY MOTOR CONVOY DESTROYED BY THE FRENCH ON FOREST ROAD

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

OFFICIAL news has reached us from Russia during the last week that the government has concluded to issue a decree, endowing the Jewish race with the right, hitherto denied, to become army officers of any grade. It is also thought that a further decree will shortly follow, giving full civil and political rights to this race. Such an advance in toleration on the part of Russia is hardly credible, but the report seems to be well authenticated.

The storm-center these last few days has been in and around Antwerp, which city the Belgians are defending with heroism and the Germans are attacking with all their strength.

At the present writing the result of the attack seems very doubtful. The Germans claim to have either taken or silenced five of the forts in the outer circle of defensives, and on Thursday, after giving due notice, commenced a general bombardment of the city, as contradistinguished from the fortifications.

The Belgians, on the other hand, claim that no forts have either been taken or have surrendered, although admitting that one or two of the least important of the forts in the exterior line of defenses have been damaged to some extent.

Mr. Winston Churchill, of the British Cabinet, is said to have visited the city during the last week to cheer the defenders, and to consult with the Belgian military commanders in charge of the defenses, as to the best and most efficient manner in which aid can be given them by the Allies. As a result of this visit, the Allies have thrown a heavy reinforcement of men and artillery into the besieged town.

The king of Belgium, Albert, is winning great praise, even from his opponents, by the self-sacrificing and courageous manner in which he is conducting himself during the siege. The queen and the children are in England, safe from any harm.

The seat of the Belgian government has been again removed, this time from Antwerp to Ostend. This is, of course, a mere precautionary measure, and is not in itself any indication that the government thinks that Antwerp is doomed to fall.

On notice of the bombardment the non-combatants, as far as possible, fled from the town, either down the Scheldt, or by road to the north towards Holland. The distance from Antwerp to the Dutch border is only a few miles, and the bulk of the exodus from the town is in that direction.

Holland, as a precautionary measure, has assembled a strong force of troops along its border adjacent to Antwerp, for the double purpose of caring for the fugitives, and to be prepared to disarm the Belgian troops in the event that Antwerp falls and they are driven across the border. In such case, under the rules of the convention of London, the Belgian troops would be interned until the end of the war.

Holland herself, according to the information which reaches us, is in a somewhat difficult position. Pressure is apparently being put upon her by both sides to induce her to abandon her neutral attitude, and her situation, geographically, is such that she cannot abandon this attitude in favor of one or the other of the combatants without exposing herself to very grave consequences.

If she declares in favor of Germany, she will lose her colonies, which are not only important and valuable to her but which, to her credit, are the best managed colonies of those of any European power. On the other hand, if she declares in favor of the Allies, she immediately exposes her own territory to the same ruin which has overtaken Belgium, as Germany would immediately invade and waste the country.

From the German standpoint, the capture of Antwerp would be very important, for the reasons I outlined last week, and of course, from an Allied standpoint the prevention of its capture would be equally important.

The other fighting in Belgium this week has been isolated and inconsequential; the tragedy in fighting of this kind is that men must die just the same, though the fighting be of no importance in its bearing on the general result.

The general position in the battle of the Aisne, if a general name can be given to the series of isolated combats stretching over a front of some two hundred miles now, remains much the same as it was last week, as regards the central and eastern portions of the battle line.

By the eastern and central portions of the line, I mean the line which, beginning at or near Lassigny in the west, a few miles to the north of Compiègne, thence runs slightly to the southeast to a point two or three miles to the north of Soissons, thence and again eastwardly to Witry, about eight miles to the northeast of Rheims. From Witry the line curves to the south to Sillery, about eight miles from Rheims to the southeast. Then it strikes almost due east through Mourmelon to St. Meuchould, famous for its style of cooking pigs' feet. From here the line runs again almost due east to a point just outside of the range of the guns of the fortress of Verdun, and to the north of that strong place. It skirts in a curving line this fortress, and runs almost due south to St. Mihiel, on the left bank of the Meuse, and thence runs again eastwardly to Château Salines in Lorraine and thence by various curves to St. Dié in the Vosges.

All along this line, during the week last past, there have been almost incessant skirmishes and artillery duels, which for the most part have been without definite result. Ground has been won, only to be lost again, and the net result of the operations has been to leave the combatants in much the same position as they occupied a week ago.

The Germans have got to gain possession of Verdun and Toul and the chain of subsidiary forts between them, before their campaign can advance, and during the past week they have made little or no progress in that object. The Allies, on the other hand, in order to rid France of the invader, have got to drive him from his entrenchments along the long line of battle, and they, too, have made very little progress.

An impartial judgment therefore is, that the week's fighting has been fruitless for both sides along the center and east of the line of battle. Along the west of the line of battle, the German right wing and the French left, the fighting has been much more severe, and also more continuous than on the remaining portions of the line of battle.

This German right wing has greatly changed its position in the last week, brought about by the persistent and sustained effort of the Allies' left wing to envelop and outflank it, resulting in both wings being extended far to the north and a little to the west of their former positions.

This line now runs, beginning at Lassigny, northward in an irregular line, running through Roye, Chaulnes, Albert, St. Laurent, three or four miles east of Arras, Lacrin, and turning west, runs through Beiturve, Hasbrouck, and reaches the coast of the channel somewhere a little to the north of Dunkirk.

The original intention of this movement was to outflank Von Kluck's army, the German right wing, but this object was subsequently modified and an attempt was made to reach Brussels and force the German garrison there to evacuate the town. However, a strong force of German cavalry, said to be in numbers about 20,000, made an unexpected appearance to the west and northwest of the Allies' left wing and caused the northward movement of that wing to be deflected to the westward and reach the coast.

Except that portion of the Allies' left wing, running from Arras northwestward to the coast, the rest of the left wing is in very much the same position as it was at the end of last week. On this part of the line of battle there have been also alternate gains and losses, but the net result is, I think, as I have stated.

In point of duration and of the number of men engaged the battle of the Aisne now holds the record in all history. It is at once the longest and largest battle since man was put on earth, whereof there is any record. There is some doubt of the probability of a relieving force, whose object would be a flank attack on the German force besieging Antwerp in order to force the raising of the siege of that town, having either been landed at, or being on the way to Ostend.

The difficulty would be to get this force on the scene of action in time to be of use. There is quite a force of English marines, some three or four thousand, at Ostend now, but this force would have to be increased to at least twenty-five thousand to make it effective in the relief of Antwerp, where the German besieging force is supposed to be about one hundred thousand strong. The events in Belgium during the coming week will have an important influence on the subsequent course of the war. The French are also said to be in strong force in Alsace-Lorraine, north of Belfort, where there are few German troops, and are said to be meditating a strong offensive move northward towards the first line of German defenses. There is, however, no official verification of this report as yet.

There has been comparatively little occurring on the sea during the past week. A British torpedo boat made a successful and daring raid in the estuary of the Ems River, on the German coast, and sank a German submarine. Several merchant vessels and fishing boats have been sunk in the North Sea and the Adriatic during the week by contact with fixed and floating mines, but happily the loss of life has not been very large. The British government has given notice of its intention hereafter to employ mines along the coasts and in the channel, as additional defenses.

The total German losses killed, wounded and missing, up to the first of September are officially stated to be 141,925, of whom 23,910 are killed, and 57,283 are missing. Of the wounded, it is stated that only about 10 per cent. have been fatally shot. A large percentage of the missing will probably never be heard of again. It would seem to be a fair estimate to put the total deaths at about 40,000 to that date.

The English casualty list brings their total up to 23,410. Both in this list and in the German, the reported mortality among the officers is very much higher in proportion than is the loss in the ranks.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to the per diem cost of this war, the estimates ranging from five to fifty millions a day. This is a very difficult matter to estimate. The British troops are the only ones who are really paid, and there are so many other variances that I cannot see how any average can be struck.

Germany has issued a statement of the number of soldiers of the Allies she now holds as prisoners of war in Germany. She claims a total of 240,000; 100,000 Russians, 103,000 French, 32,000 Belgians and some 8,000 British. We have, however, nothing but the German assertion for these figures.

All the combatants are talking about putting their prisoners of war to work. This is permitted as regards the men within certain well-established limitations, such as, that the prisoners shall not be made to work on military constructions; heretofore, roads, etc., have usually been chosen. Captured officers, however, are, according to the practice of nations, exempt from manual or other labor of any kind.

MAMMOTH GRAVES OF GERMAN DEAD IN EAST PRUSSIA

THE CITY CAMPAIGN

THE most noteworthy item of the New York Evangelistic Committee in the work among the children is this, that in the Hungarian department, as a result of meetings in an open lot on East Seventy-ninth Street, sixty-five boys and girls have united with the Hungarian Baptist Church.

The Extension Department, organized this summer, has conducted a flower mission and flowers have been given to thousands of boys and girls in the tents. These flowers have been sent by children of advantage, both individuals and Sunday schools having a share in this gracious ministry.

One little girl, who signed a card, saying that she would accept Christ as her Saviour, and try to live as he would want her to do, was asked by a worker if she had been a good girl since signing the card. She turned a radiant face up to that of the speaker and answered: "Say, I ain't been licked once since I signed that card!"

On one of the hottest days of the summer about a hundred men stood in the blazing sun at Union Square for a half hour to listen to the Gospel message, told in its simplicity by the committee's senior worker, Mr. Cranston, a man eighty-five years of age. This was perhaps the smallest meeting in this location. The crowd at Union Square has averaged two hundred, and is considerably larger at Madison Square, the number reaching twelve hundred one day the closing week of the campaign.

Early in August it became evident, owing to the general financial depression, that the work would have to close three or four weeks earlier than planned unless some unusual gifts came in. The workers were notified, but refused to accept their dismissal, saying that if the committee could not pay them they would rather work without salary for three weeks than miss the opportunity of preaching the Gospel to the people of New York. It became necessary for the committee to accept the offer of the workers, and is was a joy to see the spirit in which they carried out their sacrificial offer.

In every center where work has been carried on for any length of time, and where the crowd is from the neighborhood, there have been accessions to the neighborhood churches, and increased enrolment of children at the neighborhood Sunday schools. The boys and girls who sign cards are written to and called upon by the committee's "follow-up" worker.

OF all the people who during the Passion Week gathered about our Lord, there are few more striking than one Simon of Cyrene, who bore the cross for the Master.

From that day to this Christian people have, from time to time, gone to the rescue of the colored people as Simon went to the rescue of the Lord Christ that day so long ago. The Evangelistic Committee of New York City has for many years conducted successful work among the negroes in Manhattan, and this year did work also for this class in the Bronx.

STREET MEETING AMONG NEW YORK'S COLORED POPULATION

In a yard in West Ninety-ninth Street a work started several years ago was most successfully carried on this summer. Rev. F. Howard, assistant rector of St. Cyprian's Chapel, has a work in the neighborhood during the winter. He offered the use of his yard to the committee, if they would conduct services there nightly. This has been done and the results are most heartening. Eight have united with St. Cyprian's Chapel, and sixteen have been added to the Sunday school as a result of the "yard" meetings.

Of two of the boys who have been confirmed, one was fourteen years old and a thief. He attended the street meetings last year. This year he returned, applied for confirmation, and after being carefully prepared by Mr. Howard was confirmed; the other, his best friend, was a shiftless trifler. This boy also became interested, and with his mother applied for confirmation. His parents were separated, and he lived with his mother. His father heard of the boy's step, and the family has been reunited.

The third little girl, at the left of the picture, attended the meetings regularly last year. She is now secretary of St. Cyprian's Chapel Sunday school, and absolutely faithful and entirely accurate in her books. The feeling in the neighborhood concerning these meetings may be judged from the fact that four homes have been offered for dining-room Bible classes. Mr. Howard says of the meetings: "Some of the best people we have in our congregation (St. Cyprian's Chapel) have come through the "yard" services.

At Grant Avenue and One Hundred and Sixty-first Street Rev. P. C. James has had charge of work for colored people, also under the committee. "Upwards of one hundred and ninety souls were brought to Christ. We have had wonderful experiences," writes Mr. James; and later: "We were proud to have the tent from the Evangelistic Committee. It is the first time in the history of the Bronx that its five thousand negroes were so favored. You have done a great good to my people, mentally and spiritually."

Still farther north, in Williamsbridge, Rev. J. C. Allen has had charge of a tent, where splendid work has been done.

Mr. Allen says: "The tent work is the best thing that ever happened among the colored people in the Bronx. Grand meetings have been held. . . . The whole community has been uplifted. Eight have been brought into my church." On one occasion this summer there were eight hundred inside the tent and on the outskirts.

The attendance at these meetings in the three centers was 33,369. The branch of St. Cyprian's Chapel, already referred to, is the result of three years' work among the colored people in the neighborhood of Ninety-ninth Street.

DENOMINATIONAL NEWS FROM THE FIELD

—A CABLEGRAM DATED LAS PALMAS, AFRICA, announces that a party of missionaries on their way home on furlough were marooned by war conditions on the Canary Islands.

—AFTER SEVERAL ENFORCED DELAYS Bishop Hartzell has sailed from New York to meet Bishop Anderson and his son in England, the party planning to sail for Cape Town, South Africa, and make a joint Episcopal tour of all the missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa, covering a northward route of 2,500 miles by rail to the Belgian Congo region, where a new conference will be organized. Thence the bishops will proceed to Southern Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa, holding conferences in each section. A visit to Angola on the west coast will be followed, if war conditions permit, by a trip to Liberia. Thence the party will proceed to the Madeira Islands, and later will visit North Africa to preside at the annual conference.

—THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTH ANNUAL meeting of the American Board is scheduled for Detroit, Mich., October 13-16, with a remarkable array of speakers from other lands to take part in the interesting program: Dr. Kinnear, head of the new hospital in Foochow; Dr. Hollenbach of Africa; Dr. Hoover from Turkey, whose hospital grew out of the needs of the Armenian massacres; Dr. Tracy, president emeritus of Anatolia College, Marsovan; Dr. Raynolds, president of a college in the Far East, whose nearest college neighbor is ten days' dangerous travel away; and many others. Industrial work will be considered under the leadership of A. I. Orner of Africa, who went from the Baldwin Locomotive Works to that country, and established agricultural implement works there. Rev. Henry Fairbanks of India will also speak on this topic. A feature of the meeting will be the Shansi team of young folks who are working under the educational offer made by the Chinese government.

—THE GENERAL SYNOD OF THE MORAVIAN CHURCH met in Herrnhut in Saxony, Germany, from May 14 to June 13. It was composed of delegates from America, England, Germany, Austria, and various Foreign Mission lands, for the Moravian Church is an organic unity throughout the world. One of the duties of the General Synod is to elect a Mission Board of five members, one of whom must be an American, another an Englishman, a third a German, and two chosen from the church at large. Bishop J. Taylor Hamilton, D.D., formerly of Bethlehem, Pa., was re-elected the American member. He has held this position since 1902. It was voted not to surrender any of the mission fields of the church in spite of financial difficulties, and to make every effort to move forward in the work. Since then, however, much of the legislation of Synod has been rendered abortive by the outbreak of the European War. The Moravian Church is in a very peculiar position during this European War. It has members in each one of the contending armies. The British Synod of the church did a fine thing immediately after the declaration of war. It adopted unanimously resolutions setting forth that "hate could not exist between members of the body of Christ nor war between members of the Brethren's Church," and these resolutions were sent to the brethren in Germany. The Latin name of the Moravian Church is Unitas Fratrum, hence Moravians speak of their church as the "Brethren's Church." Comenius Hall, the main building of the Moravian College and Theological Seminary at Bethlehem, Pa., was destroyed by fire October 31, 1913. On October 2, 1914, the new Comenius Hall was dedicated free of debt. The new building is in every respect far superior to the old. Among the thousands of Americans marooned abroad on account of the war were a number of distinguished Moravians.

—"OVER 200,000 Y. M. C. A. members are in the armies of Europe," said Dr. John R. Mott, who has sailed for Holland to help work out the problems confronting Christian men in Europe. Nearly every secretary of the associations in Europe is under arms. W. E. Bristol, an American under appointment to organize the association at Adana, Turkey, who returned last week to America, reports that he found every association building in Switzerland, France and England teeming with soldiers. In fact, the passport to entrance and to every privilege and personal service was the uniform. The great London Central building has been transformed into a recruiting station. The English National Council was called on by officers and men from Earl Kitchener down to serve the troops in the mobilization camps. At national headquarters little flags stuck at 397 points show where the work is conducted. Some of these places are cow-sheds cleaned and whitewashed for association service. In other places carriage factories, barns, or haylofts. Members are detailed to fill the canteens of the soldiers en route with fresh water, and the women of the cities supply some little need or a pocket "housewife." At the big camps, where four thousand soldiers are brought together, huge "marquees" in the center of the camp bear the Y. M. C. A. emblem, and are crowded from morning till night with men in their rest hours. More than 3,000,000 pieces of stationery have already been passed. The association acts as postmaster, selling thousands of pounds' worth of stamps. One man is kept continually busy making out money-orders on the weekly pay day. He banks the men's money, and has helped to divert a large amount from the canteens and gambling. The proportionate sale of beer to mineral water changed from 75 to 15 per cent.

—PRAYER IS ASKED FOR the evangelistic meetings which are to be held in China from September 15 to December this year. Eight preparatory conferences have just been held. Almost the entire missionary body is united in prayer and co-operation. In Peking a large mat-shed or pavilion is to be erected to hold 3,000 students. The government is now proposing to give us the altar inside the Forbidden City, where the emperor annually worshiped the spirits of the land, as a site for the erection of this hall. The Christian workers of all the missions of the district are to be assembled in the city, and a training conference is to be conducted during the day with the workers. Not content with reaping among the students alone, they plan to take a large theater seating 2,500 in another part of the city to reach the gentry, literati, business men and officials. Not content even with these two, they are planning for a meeting with the president, vice-president, members of the cabinet and the leading officials of Peking to present the Gospel to them also. Last year in Foochow an average of five thousand students attended the meetings every day. It was here that the parliament adjourned and asked us to address them, and these men are now scattered through the cities of the province. They have offered us the guild halls, government buildings and even the theaters, and are co-operating in every way. Last year 1,300 Confucian students were received into the churches throughout China after the meetings. Quite apart from such special meetings it seems that we are perhaps on the verge of the greatest ingathering in China that has ever taken place in the history of Asia.—J. H. Fowler, Peitaiho, North China.

—IT IS GENERALLY CONCEDED that Europe will have to realize very heavily on its holders of American investments. Millions of dollars of our choicest investment securities may press for sale, and unless we start now, the flood of forced liquidation may swamp us. The greater amount of these securities is good, and would be held but for the pressing necessities of their holders. In view of the stupendous strain on capital that is now here, which increases daily, and which will continue to increase even after the war is over, is it not time to start a nation-wide campaign of universal saving, embracing all of our people, having for its purpose the buying of our railroads and industrial securities at bargain prices? If only 10,000,000 of our population save an additional $20 per year, it would create an investment fund of $200,000,000. If a greater sum, say $50, could be saved, a fund of $1,000,000,000 would be available to relieve the situation. What a grand opportunity to start the nation on an era of prosperity!—N. Frank, Cedarhurst, N. Y.

THE ETERNAL LIVING SOUL

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

"And man became a living soul." Gen. 2: 7. "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." John 11: 26

THE world into which we are born is a very interesting world and it ought to arouse in us all that is best and highest and most inspiring. Above all, we ought not to waste any time in useless regrets, sorrow or sin or stupidity.

Our existences start with the love of God, who has breathed into us the breath of life. We are living souls, capable of a great multitude of feelings and powers. Physical growth and pleasure, ambition, joy in achievement, love, friendship, power, discovery, invention, the delight of doing, in being, mark the creation of this living soul, and all these faculties are exercised and developed in a world which is crowded to the full with wonders and beauties and interest too great to be exhausted even during the longest and most unburdened existence.

The world in which we are living souls was never so interesting as now, in its physical attraction, because we are understanding it and discovering its wonders as never in all the centuries before. Nothing is more common than a tree or a flower or a grain of wheat. Yet around these common forms of earthly growth, millions are pouring out their energies and thousands are eagerly studying and discovering new forms of power. The combined forces of earth, air, water, light, plain, mountain, lake, river, snow, rain, sun, stars, the universe in its bewildering variety of seasons, climate, change, are forces which challenge our daily interest and help to develop our lives. They are the constant university to which all living souls are privileged to go. The earth is itself a stupendous setting for the living soul and we can never exhaust its interest or compass its entire meaning.

What we call Science is also adding to the interest of the life of the living soul. Yesterday it was counted a marvel to speak to a friend a few blocks away. Today the New York business man calmly calls up his friend in Denver, and tomorrow he will be heard by the business man in Tokyo or Melbourne. "Good morning, Yuan Shi Kai," says the President of the United States to the president of the Chinese Republic. "I hope everything is going well with you over there. How does it feel to be at the head of the greatest republic in the world?"

"You are very kind," says Yuan Shi Kai, "being president of any republic, even of a little one with 100,000,000 people like yours, is some task. I could get on very well if it were not for the people who persist in talking to the motorman when the traffic is thickest. But I appreciate your courtesy in calling me up."

"I have troubles of my own," says the president of the United States. "But they seem very small by the side of yours. You have my best wishes for a happy day. Good-by."

Making Life Mightier

AND all this is the fancy of today but the fact of tomorrow. Yesterday a man touched a button and opened the gates of a world exposition, at the end of a thread of copper. But today a quiet little man in an Italian laboratory sends out of a small lens a violet ray that, without even the friendly aid of a wire, gleams across two miles of space and explodes a torpedo at the bottom of a river. The great ocean steamer is sinking with its living souls. But across hundreds of miles of stormy water a dozen ships are throbbing, invisible to one another, but knowing exactly what has happened and where to go to rescue what yesterday would have gone down with absolute certainty. Nature herself, mysterious but divinely affectionate in her real power, comes to meet Science as living souls struggle through long years to read her hieroglyphics. A continent is freed from pestilence by the extermination of a mosquito and thousands of living souls are saved a long and dangerous fever by a little needle and a bit of matter injected into the body. The living soul of today lives more years in a shorter period than the living soul of the yesterdays. We walk amid marvels that once would have been called magic. It is the magic of Nature, found out by Science, and it makes the daily life of the living soul doubly worth living.

It is also a tremendously interesting time to live because of the historical movements in the world. These movements are political, social, industrial, economic, religious. They touch all nations, affect all conditions, and are of world-wide interest. Papers, telegrams, cables, and books tell only a part of the story of these movements. Many of them defy analysis and can only be measured and understood years from now. But all of them are vastly important and represent the struggle of the living soul in man, battling for more life. These movements in history, this human restlessness, are signs of a divine force working in human history. As Winston Churchill says: "One interpretation of history is that spiritual power rises and falls like the waves of the sea. A characteristic sign of the rise of one of the waves in history is an extreme restlessness. It may be called a divine discontent. And are there, I wonder, many who read these words today so spiritually numb as not to feel within them something of the driving power of that mysterious energy which is abroad?

"That same driving power produced the Renaissance, produced Shakespeare, produced the Reformation, and it is now preparing to produce a greater age than history has ever witnessed."

What educated man or woman can remain indifferent or stupid when these great world movements of this age are displayed before them? There are three great groups of movements: (1) Industrial—a demand and a struggle for human justice. (2) Economic—a demand and a struggle for efficiency. (3) Religious—a demand and a struggle for spiritual satisfaction.

Under the first group we notice the struggle in Mexico, which is in reality a cry from the people for land rights. In Colorado and Michigan, a cry for human justice in the participation with the fruits of toil. In the cry of the children and motherhood for freedom to play and work in normal and human ways.

Making Life More Useful

UNDER the second group we hear the cry for a cleaner, happier, more efficient physical existence. The temperance wave sweeping the world—what is that but the struggle of the living soul for more life, emancipation from a poison that has for centuries cut short the living soul's happiness and efficiency? It is marvelous to note how fast the educated thought of the world is accumulating overwhelming evidence against what was once considered not only a human personal right, but a physical necessity for health.

The cry for efficiency in the great economic movement of the world is the cry of the living soul, protesting against impure food, diseased parenthood, and ignorant clinging to tradition. It is the cry of little children, of enslaved miners, of machine-shaped men, of sighing and wailing womanhood. It is a cry in the night that must be heard in the day in which you, who call yourselves educated, live. And it is being heard. When 200 coal miners in West Virginia, in a second's flash, passed from living into ghastly, mutilated dying, what happened to those who hung above the black smoke of the pit's mouth and cried aloud the names of husbands and fathers who would never see the sun again?

What would have happened only a few years ago? The widows and orphans of that coal-mining disaster would have been the recipients of a few days' or months' private sympathy and charity. And then they would have been forgotten and neglected, to add to the pauper's lot, and its final grave. But today the great State of West Virginia gives to every widow of that disaster $20 a month as long as she lives, and $5 for every child dependent on her. Insufficient groping of that living soul of the State to act the part of justice to the beaten and crushed humanity she should have protected from such a calamity, but a long step upward by the side of the careless hardness of heart of less than a century ago. The living sou is coming to its own in this age, and even th State is beginning to feel its divine responsibilit for its children. The world movement for eff ciency is revealing to mankind its oneness of rela tion, its solidarity of neighborhood. It is a cr and a struggle for a happier and cleaner an purer and longer existence in the flesh.

The religious movement is a cry for unity, fo a simpler creed, for a more satisfying and beaut fying faith. It finds expression in varied ways, i federation of the sects, in a daily religion tha makes all energy worship, in a worship that satis fies the hungry heart and mind together. Wha is all this religious restlessness but simply the cr and hunger of the human child for its heavenl Father? The lifting of worn hands, tired of th day's work, and beseeching the Infinite for a night' rest that shall have an awakening in the room tha has a window that opens towards the dawn. Ma was never more religious than at the present time

What Is Your Life's Program?

THE living soul never in all history beat its wing more passionately against the manufacture bars of its creed cage or longed more deeply fo freedom to sing its song of faith over the flower sprinkled meadows of service and under the blu sky of God's boundless love. The religious move ment is the cry of enfranchised hearts that hav toiled in slavery but will work harder in service the cry for mental and emotional liberty to lov God and men without a priest to dictate the metho of one or an organization to compel the other.

Now, the living soul cannot get a vision of al this tremendous world in which it lives withou having certain feelings and desires. You wh have begun to get what we call an education o all people in the world must, considering its sur passing interest and meaning, have some vision o your great place in this great universe. What mus your living soul cry out in the midst of its set ting?

"I cannot live an indifferent or careless existence Life is too potent, too earnest, too gigantic a thing If I am a living soul I must respond to the great ness, the magnitude of my surroundings. If th ocean is so vast my ship must be great enough t meet its storms and swing majestic on its heavin tide and float into its ample harbor.

"If life is so great, I cannot without infinit stupidity live a small existence. My career mus have all the elements of greatness. I protes against either the drone or the butterfly type, an most of all against that choice of a life progran which leaves no room in it for the "sacrificial ad venture."

I might escape my responsibility to live lif grandly if all it meant was today. I could easil excuse myself from its obligations to service if knew that a few short years told the story of it love and passion and tears and sinning and joy o achievement. "Let us eat, drink and be merry for tomorrow we—live"—ah! that makes a differ ence. If I am going to live tomorrow and the da after, and after—what small or mean or unworth thing can I do to this living soul to mar its beaut or destroy its dignity?

You are living souls that are going to live for ever. What is your definition of your own work What is your program? Is it worthy the setting Or is the picture you are going to paint cheape than the frame? Have you picked out a caree that will fit into an endless life?

Here then is the summing up of human achieve ment. We are living souls with the power of neve dying. Let us act accordingly. If education mean anything it must mean the definition which a educated man has of his life work. If a thing i worth doing it must be worth doing in the ligh of eternity. And what tremendous tasks belong t en endless life! The question was raised among a group of thinking people whether spiritual or re ligious achievement had been as great as scientifi or mechanical. The answers were varied, but what ever has been true, there can be no question that th tasks that belong to religion and spiritual need

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

SUNDAY, October 25. Matthew 17: 17. "O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you? Bring him hither to me?" Wasted mercies, and the patriotic reflections they elicit from the kindest of benefactors—what an extensive chapter of varied contents could be written on this subject by the biographer of the earthly life of our Lord! This text is addressed, not to the disciples only, but to the entire company which had gathered about the lunatic boy. In one form or other, lack of understanding, a perverse will, and above all, the absence of that faith which seeks the honor of God rather than its own advantage in whatever it undertakes, were apparent in all to whom these words were spoken. It is, therefore, not the just impatience of a teacher and guide who might have expected better things from those for whom he had labored such a long time—this would have been very human, indeed! But it is the censure which the all-seeing God applies to our spiritual deficiency, when he discerns unwarranted doubts and perplexities in matters in which the instruction which he has previously administered ought to direct us unerringly. No disheartening experience of the past, however, can turn the Lord from his mission of mercy. The echo of his rebuke has hardly died upon the air, when the call of the ever-ready Helper is heard: "Bring him hither to me."

MONDAY, October 26. Matthew 17: 20. "Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible to you." The unfortunate boy had been healed, and the disciples, crestfallen, approach the Master to inquire why the cure had been impossible to them. The father of the boy had acknowledged, with tears, his share of unbelief in the attempted transaction of the disciples; but the disciples seem not to have taken the Lord's reproof to heart. He must tell them of "their" unbelief, or little faith. For the glory of God, a believing disciple may, on occasion, attempt even the seemingly impossible. God will second his believing effort. Christians are not promised miraculous powers which they may exercise for their own entertainment or that of others. That would only cause sensations unfavorable to the cause of Christianity. But believers are here given a solemn assurance that genuine faith has mountain-moving virtue in it. All things that are necessary for salvation, for the proper exercise of our Christian belief, for the needed assistance which we must render to our fellow men, and, last but not least, for the glory of our God, shall be supplied at the proper moment, if we trustfully address him in meekness, who here says: "Verily, I say unto you." He has promised his aid, and our help lies in that promise.

TUESDAY, October 27. Mark 9: 29. "This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting." There was another reason why the disciples failed in their attempted cure of the lunatic boy: lack of proper spiritual preparation. God, indeed, can do anything whatsoever he hath pleased. But the children of God can only do what he promises to do for them and through them. The Christian's business, therefore, is to get very close to the mind of God and to understand his will. God has, in extraordinary instances, wrought his purpose through any organ he found at hand. He spoke to Balaam through the prophet's animal. He uttered the finest prophecy on the atoning virtue of the death of Christ through unbelieving Caiaphas. But ordinarily God chooses for the manifestation of his power and goodness instruments which he has prepared for that purpose. Prayer and fasting may be called standing occupations of those who live with God. The former represents constant communion with God; the latter is an effort to free the mind from its carnal shackles, as far as this can be done without endangering life, to subdue the worldly mind in us, to fit us for that struggle in which we wrestle, not with flesh and blood, but with spiritual wickedness in high places. The powers of the kingdom of darkness must be met and defeated by the most spiritual-minded among the followers of Christ.

WEDNESDAY, October 28. Matthew 17: 22, 23. "The Son of man shall be betrayed into the hands of men: and they shall kill him, and the third day he shall be raised again." The angel at the open tomb of Jesus on Easter morning reminds the disciples of the episode here recorded, saying: "Remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee." The lesson of the cross was the hardest lesson the disciples had to learn. And the most necessary. Paul has gone on record declaring the Christian religion a myth if the death and resurrection of Jesus must be eliminated from it. This explains why our Lord, on this last tour through Galilee, comes back again and again to the great tragedy at the end of his life. By constant repetition of the same lesson, the heavenly Teacher wishes to make an impression on the minds of his pupils. He may vary the details of the lesson slightly and change its emphasis; but it is always the same story of his sufferings and the glory which shall follow. At first it had roused only indignation among the disciples. On this occasion we are told that they were filled with sorrow in hearing the Master reiterate what they were loath to hear. Sorrow in view of the cross on which our Redeemer died is good. It is the most befitting attitude for a sinner when he reflects what a mighty ransom heaven had to furnish for his liberation. But that is the chastened sorrow of the believer in the Gospel of forgiveness. In the present instance, the sorrow of the disciples was a worldly affair. They had grasped the literal meaning of the Lord's communication to them; it meant separation from a kind friend and benefactor. It spelt a tremendous loss. But the spiritual meaning of the cross, the glory of the atonement, they had not grasped. We, too, have need of repeating to our sluggish minds every day the greatest of all the lessons of our religion: Jesus died for me, and rose again.

THURSDAY, October 29. Luke 9: 44. "Let these sayings sink down into your ears; for the Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men." Rationalistic writers claim to have discovered, in the frequent remarks of the Lord, about his impending passion, a morbid spirit. A mere man, as they believe him to have been, his mind had begun to dwell on the hopelessness of his undertaking, and his spirit was become bitter and morose. This view would turn the majestic utterances of our Lord about his death and resurrection, with which we meet so frequently toward the end of his earthly career, into the language of an impotent man, who regards martyrdom not as the crowning feat of his mission, but as the wreck of that mission. This text shows that in his frequent predictions of his coming agony, our Lord did not think of himself, but of his disciples. A false conception of the Messiah, which they were cherishing with the multitude of the Jewish people of their time, had to be shattered. For the false glory of a great earthly kingdom which they anticipated for their Master, he wanted to substitute the true glory of the thorn-crowned King of the Cross, who by his death defeats not the political enemies of his nation, but the great enemies of the entire human race, sin, death, and the devil. He would, therefore, freight with emphasis his repeated statements about his sufferings that they might sink into the consciousness of his disciples, and cause them to look forward to his great ordeal as the consummation of the best hope of mankind.

FRIDAY, October 30. Matthew 17: 25. "What thinkest thou, Simon? Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom and tribute? Of their own children or of strangers?" During the Lord's last visit at his beloved city of Capernaum, Peter is approached by the collectors of the Jewish temple-tax, which was being gathered about that time, and was asked whether his Master was not in the habit of paying that tax, which every devout Jew annually contributed to the maintenance of the temple buildings and the procuring of the materials used for worship. Peter affirmed the question. It may have been that Peter knew from previous occasions that his Master paid the tax; but the conversation in which Jesus engaged as he came into the house to report what the collectors had said to him, shows that Peter had had another motive in quickly saying yes to the inquiry of the collectors. He remembered our Lord's remarks about his coming suffering. Peter calculated that if the payment of the temple-tax was refused that might start at once the suffering of which Jesus had spoken. He would be denounced to the Jews as an enemy of their ancient worship, an innovator. As there existed at that time a sect among the Jews who refused to pay the temple-tax as long as the Romans were in possession of the land and the holy city, the Lord's refusal might have carried a political meaning and stamped him as a revolutionary. Hence, Peter promptly said yes, intending to forestall trouble that he saw coming for his Lord. Jesus' answer is a correction of the hasty yes of Peter. If he chooses to pay the tax, it is his sovereign good pleasure. Peter is made to acknowledge that, in principle, the Lord and the disciples are free. Not to avoid trouble, but for a higher reason will the Lord pay the tribute money.

SATURDAY, October 31. Matthew: 26, 27. "Then are the children free. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money; take that, and give unto them for me and thee." Our Lord's claim of immunity from being taxed applied to himself alone, he being the Son of God, the Lord of the temple, and not required to pay the ransom money of the Israelites. But since the tax collectors had inquired about him and his disciples, he answers in the plural. His reason for paying the tax is: He does not want to give any one offense. In his humanity he makes himself as other men, and teaches men by his own example to submit to law and authority. The method, however, which he chooses on this occasion for procuring the tribute-money—which he could have obtained in various other ways—serves to emphasize his divinity. He is Lord of the vast dominion of the universe, and all things are put under his feet, also the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the sea. In the clear consciousness of the fulness of the Godhead which dwells in him bodily, he submits to the regulations of church and State, each sphere of authority receiving from him its due respect, and thus he has set us an example that we should follow, rendering unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's.

of the world are the greatest in the world. You will never find any higher or more heroic problems to solve than those which have to do with the making of a better world. Can you find anywhere among the enormous world achievements, like Panama Canals, expositions, mechanical and electrical triumphs of modern energy, anything greater than Dan Crawford has been doing in Africa? Put a man down in a degraded, filthy, poverty-stricken, disease-haunted African jungle, without a knowledge of the language, with almost no money or means, hundreds of miles from any white man's civilization, and calmly ask him to transform this besotted community into a sanitary, moral, self-supporting, Christian neighborhood—and he does it in a few years. That is a man's task, undertaken by one who knew and knew beyond dispute that he was an endless living soul and that his African brothers ought to know it and enjoy it, too.

Or take such a task as helping a whole country like Mexico to civilization and comfort. If that great task is a part of the moral responsibility of this country, as I believe it is, it is as much greater than a physical conquest of a people as ruling one's spirit is greater than taking a city. The cleaning up of Vera Cruz and the management of it on humane and civilized plans for the common people's betterment is infinitely greater than a bombardment or an attack with guns and force.

Life is a splendid possession. You are living souls, not mere tissue of blood and muscle and sinew, but living souls, fashioned by divine love, intended for heavenly uses. And you are endless souls, beginning here in this world the education that all eternity shall not be too long to develop. It is worth while, isn't it? To take this gift of God and use it so that the world shall know it is immortal. "He that liveth and believeth in me," said Jesus, "shall never die." Do you believe that? If you do you can never from this day forward consecrate yourselves to anything less than the building of your living soul into a house fit for eternal habitation.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST CATASTROPHE

AMERICA'S PART TO BIND UP THE BROKEN HEARTS

AMERICA is hastening with willing feet to bind up the broken hearts—and hearths—of Europe. The great impulse to help these pitiable mothers and children is being felt throughout our happy, prosperous land. The humblest and the strongest are adding their gifts to the Fund for Widows and Orphans of the War. Each day's mail in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office grows heavier. As fast as the movement becomes known the "zone of giving" extends. It will not be long now until our readers everywhere will be sending in their contributions, and not once only but again and again. While this vast need prevails there will be many tender-hearted, noble-minded men and women who will set aside and forward to the fund a weekly gift for this great Christian charity.

When we went to press last week a total of $6,091.69 had been received. The very next mail brought this up to over $7,000. Steadily the amount has risen. On Monday, October 5, $1,307.63 came in; Wednesday, $1,-325.93; by noon of Friday, October 9, the generous offerings of our readers for the relief of the innocent victims of the war amounted to $12,302.74. So large a sum so early in the movement means that the world is going to see a wonderful outpouring of material sympathy for these needy multitudes on the part of American Christians.

IF the constantly changing and conflicting news of the progress of the war strikes one with a sense of unreality, the stern fact remains that the constantly increasing host of dependent women and children must have aid from America before to their miserable state are added the woes that winter brings to the homeless and the poor.

Mrs. C. W. Stratford is the wife of an American business man, and lives at 800 Riverside Drive, New York. She was staying at Toulouse during August and part of September. "The scenes at the station I remember most clearly," says Mrs. Stratford. "The refugees had left their homes, some in freight trains, when they could get a chance, some using the family horse or mule, too needed to be requisitioned by the government, some simply walking. Those who took freight trains had as hard a time as any, for their cars were liable to be switched to sidings for hours at a time, or even for days, owing to the movement of troops to the front. Toulouse is a garrisoned town, so they felt safe in camping, gipsy-fashion, just where they landed, near the station. They looked like gipsies, there in the fields and woods, but they did not live like them. They do not know how to make themselves comfortable, as gipsies do, out of doors, and you do not see fires and open air cooking. The peasants there bring them things to eat, but all who can walk, as most of them can, go into Toulouse, where there are, as in Paris, many free depots for food. These meals keep the refugees alive. At night they roll themselves in their coats, if they have any, and go to sleep on the ground just where they are. Some have had blankets given them. I remember that it seemed as if everybody was crying all the time; the babies because they are cold and hungry, and the children because they see their mothers crying."

When one realizes that it is estimated that 10,000,000 people are rendered homeless by the devastation of northern and northeastern France, one can understand that these civic efforts only partially cover the need. Yet without them the situation would be unthinkable!

To return to the description given by Mrs. Stratford: "In sunny weather this is not so bad, but I can't bear to think of what will happen when the rainy winter of France comes on. Perhaps the boldest and bravest will return to their homes such as they are, and try to make a fresh start, but most of them will have to stay right where they are. It looks as if a winter of terrible suffering for the people of France is ahead."

In Vienna refugees from Galicia are still flocking to the gates. According to the report of a gentleman from Vienna, who has private news, over fifteen thousand have come in already. Vienna can no longer hold them and they have spilled all over the surrounding country. Vienna is in a mountainous region and into the houses of these mountaineers, whose industry is farming and grazing, come the refugees. "Food in Vienna is held down rigidly to low prices," says the same gentleman, "at a penalty of imprisonment, but there is not enough of it to go round."

WANDERING FROM PLACE TO PLACE SEEKING REFUGE

In Belgium things grow worse and worse. All the care that is given her refugees in Paris, and all the care they are getting in England (a large building in London is devoted to the needs of women and children and is christened "The House of a Thousand Sorrows") cannot relieve the situation. It is a case of a whole nation suffering from famine. If all the money now raised in England were to be distributed among the needy, each would have but seventy-five cents. Mr J. H. Shorthouse, an Englishman, writes in the New York Times: "The people have not, most of them, energy to move to get to help. They sit dumb, dazed, by the roadsides, or over the ruins of their homes, or wander about in the woods near the sites of their old homes. Many of the villages were submerged by the Belgians to protect the approaches to cities. Even where there is wheat left in the village they can not grind it, since they are not permitted to use the windmills for fear they may be giving signals. Many of these miserable people have already died."

EVERY day adds a considerable volume of contributions to the fund from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and their friends. It is inspiring to note the enthusiasm with which so many are entering into this great work of international relief and life-saving. Many are making real sacrifices in order to have a share in this beneficent work.

Mrs. M. K. T., Bristol, Tenn. ($2), writes: "I am a widow myself, old, poor and very frail, but I cannot refrain from contributing a mite for the relief of the Silent Sufferers. I know something of the horrors of the Civil War, but they were utterly incomparable to those of this European War. I trust my little gift will add something to the relief of those who need it so sadly."

The "Faithful Farmerettes," of Brodhead, Wis., organized for church and charitable work, send ten dollars through Mrs. Arthur Miller, treasurer, to be applied for the relief of the Silent Sufferers.

A Friend, Saylesville, N. J., sends five dollars and writes: "I wish it were more, for the Silent Sufferers of the war. I am a widow and I certainly sympathize with those who have had their husbands and sons taken from them in this terrible war."

A Reader, New Brunswick, N. J sends five dollars and writes: "I ar an orphan and have to work for living, and I feel sorry for the orphan who have been made in such a crue way."

Mrs. F. F., Kewanee, Ill., sends fiv dollars "to give some starving soul loaf. I only wish I could do more."

J. C. W., Barboursville, W. Va. ($5) writes: "This is for the Relief Fun of the Widows and Orphans. May thi fund be the greatest collection yo have ever made for any cause." T which many will add "Amen."

C. A. T., Albany, N. Y. ($5) writes: "Please accept this from C. A and M. R. T. for the needy sufferer in the European War. I am a vetera of the Civil War and was wounde three times at Gettysburg."

Surely those who have served in th field and those others who have bee made widows by war, are best fitte to appreciate the situation in Europ today. The letters we have quote speak well for their generous heart

"Send this where you will t Europe, to help out a little in feed ing and clothing those poor helples orphans and widows. Please send i to the most needy place. Pray muc to God to break up this war," is th sincere aspiration of E. J. B., Shenan doah, Iowa ($5).

Now here is a very touching letter "I am a little girl, five years. I wa sick, and mamma gave me some mone for taking medicine, and I am going t send it to the poor little girls who hav lost their papas in the war. Fro Gracie Ritter, Clyde, N. D." Surely blessing will follow this little gift fro a five-year-old.

Here is a charming little letter fro Plattsburg, N. Y., signed "Richar Williams." He writes: "I am a littl boy seven years old, and want to sen this twelve cents, all I have in m bank, for some poor little child tha has lost his papa in the war." Ma God bless the little giver, who has ser his all with so generous a heart!

Rev. E. O. Guerrant, president o the America Inland Mission, write from Clay City, Ky., enclosing $5.2 the gift of an audience of Kentuck highlanders, to which he preached th previous Sunday. He says: "Thes poor children have little money, an the highlanders but little more, bu they give it with all their heart."

In response to the appeal made t several Cotton Exchanges to donate bale of cotton for the Widows and Or phans Relief Fund, Mr. W. B. Goud lock, president Oklahoma State Co ton Exchange, under date of October writes as follows:

"We are in receipt of yours of th 26th, and take pleasure in advisin that at a meeting of our directors th writer was instructed to send you contribution for the Widows and Or phans of the war-stricken district o Europe, and the writer has today in structed our secretary to forwar same to you."

The following day, after the recei of this letter, a draft of $50 was re ceived from the secretary of this e change for the contribution.

This is but one of the many instance where the need of the Widows and Or phans in war-stricken Europe is s generously responded to through th efforts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

FRIENDS, give at once to this caus Give largely if you have prospere largely. Make some sacrifice worth of you—worthy of your Saviour—i order that his name may have th only glory that shall come out of th grievous war. Give little if circum stances so require. It is all alike in hi sight, if it be right in yours. Giv quickly in any case. And then giv again. Address, The Widows an Orphans Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HER ALD, Bible House, New York.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

Looking Ahead

WHEN the great war broke out unexpectedly and spread like a prairie fire, involving all the five continents, the world was temporarily stunned. So extensive a cataclysm was undreamed of. It was said that Christianity had collapsed, that civilization had failed, that a relapse to barbarism would surely result. Now, though the war is in its third month and growing steadily worse, the universal panic has subsided to such a degree that men find themselves regarding it with philosophic eyes, and weighing its ultimate consequences. They are already looking ahead to the future.

And in that future what do we see? In these last weeks the minds of men have undergone a material change. War, once invested with the halo of romance, has lost all its dignity and picturesqueness. It is stripped, let us hope finally and forever, of its illusions. We need but turn our eyes toward the blood-soaked fields of Europe, the leveled and fire-blackened walls of towns and villages now wholly deserted, the long, shallow grave-trenches filled with the dead, and all the evidences of general devastation, to be unchangeably convinced that war is an accursed thing, which should be forever banished from the world.

But it is not alone the illusion of war that has been destroyed. In every land where people have been taught to think, the eyes of their understanding are being opened. They now see the real character and purpose of the oppressive burdens that have been so long imposed upon them and which have now become intolerable. With the lifting of the veil, they discern the selfishness of the governing classes and their indifference to the welfare of the voiceless multitudes.

Whether or not the war is a phase of the great Armageddon conflict, as some notable theologians and students of prophecy are claiming, one thing is assured: it gives promise of being the greatest turning-point in human history during the last twenty centuries. It will turn the mind of the world toward the rights of man, and we are led to hope also that it may turn the nations to a greater dependence upon God's will and a closer conformity with his laws for the world's government. Civilization has been shocked, but not wrecked; Christianity, which has been ignored by those influences that precipitated the conflict, will prove itself stronger than ever and the millions will turn to it as the only hope of world-betterment.

A Stay for Impoverished Tenants

CITY CHAMBERLAIN BRUERE of New York City, Justice Hartman, and other municipal officials, are giving their attention to a plan for creating a Tenants' and Landlords' Commission, to become part of the metropolitan government. Public attention has been attracted recently to the sufferings caused among the poor of the city by the working out of the eviction law, and the proposal to create the new commission is an effort to save the worthy poor from suffering and to find a less painful method of settling disputes between landlords and tenants. The new commission will aim to protect the interests of the landlords and also to aid the impoverished tenants.

Two incidents recently reported indicate the suffering caused by the present abrupt method of carrying out the eviction law. Both of them occurred on September 30, the Jewish Day of Atonement. David Abramson, a tailor, who has been for some time out of work, his wife and four children, aged 14, 11, 10 and 4, were driven and locked out of their home, after their furniture had been forcibly removed by a marshal and three assistants, while New York's East Side was alive with the pleasurable excitement of its great religious holiday. High indignation was manifested at the eviction, but this was turned into charity, and as is usual when evictions take place among the Jews, a plate for receiving contributions was placed by neighbors upon one of the household chairs on the sidewalk. This was soon filled with money, with which arrangements were made for renting a flat next door. The kind neighbors moved back the furniture that had been taken away and the weeping was turned to rejoicing. More pathetic still was the eviction of the family of Louis Kobritz, a peddler, whose wife was about to become a mother. The marshal's men are reported to have seized the bed in which she lay and carried it out into the hallway; she was later taken to the police station, and still later to the hospital. It is to avoid the possibility of such scenes as these that the new Commission is suggested.

It is to be earnestly hoped that the plans for the new commission will be rapidly consummated, and that throughout America city governments will interest themselves in similar practical plans for the protection and relief of the poor.

Has the Message Reached You?

GOOD impulses are commands brought to us by invisible couriers from the King. He does not issue the same orders to every soldier of the Cross. Like every commander who knows his men, he fits each commission to the individual. Yet the soldiers of the army of the Lord, like those of nations, sometimes grievously disappoint their commander's hopes. Have you had an impulse to help the pitiable women and children in war-weary Europe? Then he who knows each of them by name has commissioned you to supply their bitter need.

There is no gainsaying the fact that Christ has laid it upon his church to minister to that stricken company. There is no gainsaying the fact that he will accomplish this great work of mercy through individuals picked out by him as ready for the service. Are you one of that relief corps? No greater work of human helpfulness has ever been given the Christian church to do. Thousands are responding to the divine impulse to help. A general loves the soldier who leaps to obey his command, be that soldier's ability what it may. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, be the giver's ability what it may. Has he sent a courier to you, saying, "In the campaign against sin, the Lord requires of you at this time that you show kindness to one of the least of these his little ones"? If he has so honored you, delay not, for flowers for tired hands crossed on still bosoms are not the need. The need is for bread between starved lips, milk upon parched baby tongues, shoes upon blistered feet, skirts upon shivering limbs, beds for weary bodies, cots for tired children, shelter and warmth and sustenance for households bereft of home and means.

Has he put in your heart the impulse to do something to relieve these amazing sufferers? What would you think of the soldier in the ranks who should speculate upon a command to advance upon the foe? What greater ally has sin than Want? What greater ally than Kindness has heaven? The mystery of this war is as yet unsolvable. There is no mystery about the condition of the women and children who have been stripped bare of every comfort by the war. There is no mystery about the task set before the church: it is plainly an opportunity to show forth Christ in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. Are you one of those chosen to advance his banner against the allies, Sin and Want? Brother, sister, "the victory may depend on you." Not on how much you can give, but on your giving it.

Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer him!
Be jubilant, my feet!

To Our Readers

THE season is at hand when a very large proportion of our readers—in fact, all of them who are so minded—can render valuable service to their favorite home journal with very slight effort. Of late years, the constant growth of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family Circle has taxed our facilities, especially at the season of renewing subscriptions. November and December with us are tremendously busy months, in which great masses of renewals come in together within a brief period. If that period were somewhat more extended, beginning earlier, it would greatly facilitate matters.

We therefore take this opportunity of asking our readers of they will not help to lighten our burden materially by sending in their subscriptions as far ahead of their renewal date as possible. We ask this as a very personal favor to ourselves, which will divide the pressure so that we can cope with it to better advantage, and will thus enable us to render better service all round. If your subscription expires at any time within the next month or six weeks, you can help us greatly by sending in your renewal during the present week.

We ask everyone who reads this to regard it as a personal request. We feel that we can depend on all who so regard it to assist us in getting the best results from our force of clerks, by relieving the pressure when the flood-tide of renewals is at its height. Your own renewal, sent in early, goes to assure uninterrupted and perfect deliveries. Your date of expiry will be advanced to one year ahead of the present date on your wrapper, so that you will not miss a single number by renewing in advance.

The Value of Neatness

SO HIGH is the value put upon our personal appearance nowadays that only genius or the very rich can afford to disregard the way they look. So great a stress does one of the big Chicago stores lay upon the details of toilet that it prints a little booklet, which it distributes to all employees, that has useful hints as to the care of hair and nails, the wearing of tasteful and fitting dress, and with little hints as to the proper day costume of both men and women. "It is only business," says the manager of the house. "It pays to please the eyes of the customers. The goods our messengers deliver are enhanced in value by the fact that the boy who hands them in is well dressed. The vendors of proprietary articles, the chemists and druggists, taught the world a lesson when they hit upon the idea of putting their wares up in tastefully designed boxes, wrappers and tins. As with packages, so with persons. The becoming exterior tells. You are glad to see it again."

The matter of neatness of appearance of their staff is being taken up by employers very widely. One great railroad has a "bureau of neatness," through which all new conductors, ticket sellers and other employees are supplied with a little circular upon the importance of a neat appearance.

A foreign ambassador, who has served at several large capitals of the world, told lately of an emissary who had returned to him from a mission and announced failure. "Were you, may I ask, wearing that waistcoat?" with a thumb jerked in the direction of the crumpled garment. "I was." "Then," said his chief, "I do not marvel at your lack of success."

Next to a cheery manner, a neat appearance is any man's best capital. The two together create an atmosphere in which "luck" likes to linger. Success will not come to meet you half way unless you look inviting and agreeable.

Comment by the Way

—THE VOTE OF VIRGINIA in favor of prohibition brings the total number of "dry" States up to ten, viz.: Virginia, West Virginia, North Dakota, Kansas, Maine, Georgia, Oklahoma, Tennessee, North Carolina and Mississippi. After November when the Virginia law goes into operation, there will be a total population of over 17,000,000 in "dry" territory.

—LIFE AMONG THE poor in the winter is a hard problem at best, and there is a strong likelihood that this year it will be specially severe for many who have been made idle through business conditions created by the war. Doubtless, numbers of these unfortunates will come to New York; but the metropolis has a big problem of its own in the line of unemployment. The Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau will be taxed to its utmost to meet the demands upon it during the approaching winter. In ordinary years it finds employment for some four thousand applicants, but this year the expectation is that the number will be greatly increased.

—WHEN THE BILL of the Great War comes to be settled, it will be found a stupendous one. Political economists estimate that, in the event of hostilities lasting six months, the monetary loss to the world will aggregate $17,600,000,000, and conditions will be such that national loans, aggregating $8,000,000,000, will be needed. In times of peace, the annual military expenditures of all the European nations reach $1,772,156,000, so that half of a year of war at the present tension would equal nearly twenty years' expenditures in peace time. These estimates do not include the great loss sustained by industry and commerce, nor the crops, buildings and other property destroyed, but relate solely to the provisioning, feeding, wages, cost of mobilization, ammunition (land, sea and aerial), ambulances, outfitting, bridges and pontoons, fuel, requisitions, loss on taxes and general incidentals connected with the actual operations of a campaign as vast as that which is now under way in Eastern and Western Europe.

—NOT THE SIZE OR MONETARY value of the offering, but the spirit in which it is given is what counts. God looks at the heart. It is related of a prosperous man that having been asked to help a worthy charity, he said he would give the widow's mite, and "that was enough because Jesus himself had commended it." "Oh," was the reply, "that would be too much. You know she gave all she had—just all her living. You are worth hundreds of thousands of dollars; but we couldn't think of asking so much." The rich man grew silent and thoughtful. He had not looked at it in that way. We do not assume to suggest how much your contribution to the Widows and Orphans Fund should be. Little or big, it will be equally welcome. You must decide with your own conscience. But we do urge you to give quickly so that some one of the great army of Silent Sufferers may be your own special beneficiary. Send in your gift to the Widows and Orphans Fund today.

Commits Suicide by Burning

A YOUNG wood-carver and clay-modeler of New York, in a fit of mental aberration, committed suicide in a most shocking manner the other day. He had been acting strangely for several days. He was despondent because he had to make his living by doing cheap, rough work in a plaster-cast factory, instead of in the studio of the artist, which was his ambition. On Sunday evening at his father's home he modeled a bas-relief of a smiling child, which was pronounced by his parents and brothers as being fine, and they assured him that if he would be patient and industrious he would be able to do creditable work. Soon after he went a little distance away to the Bronx woods, which he loved so well, and to the very rock where he did so much reading, and building a fire about a boulder with brush and autumn leaves he tied one end of a rope around a tree and the other about his body and hung over the fire till he was burned to death. His family, who were searching for him all night, found his charred remains at daybreak on Monday. Anyone looking at his beautiful, intelligent and honest face, as it appeared in the newspaper, with the story of the tragedy, would feel like crying at such a horrible fate. His parents believe that overstudy had unbalanced his reason. With the fires of genius and of ambition in his breast, he undertook the course of study at night, after a hard day's work, which broke him down, and made a wreck of him. To all discouraged persons, who contemplate suicide, the voices of conscience and of God speak the selfsame words that Paul uttered to the man who, disappointed, drew out his sword to kill himself:

Do thyself no harm! (Acts 16: 28.)

Earthquake Kills 2,500

ON the night of October 3, an earthquake visited the cities of Isharta, numbering 25,000 inhabitants, and Burdar, with 12,000, and other districts in the province of Koma, Asia Minor. At least 2,500 lives were lost in the province of Momis. God's touch is revealed in wildness and severity in nature, experience and the Scriptures. There is the zephyr and tornado, the calm and ocean storm, the solid ground and the quaking, cracking earth. Earthquakes have played havoc with cities in olden times. They had them in Palestine, according to the words of the prophet:

Ye shall flee like as ye fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah. (Zech. 14: 5.)

Cure Discovered for Pellagra

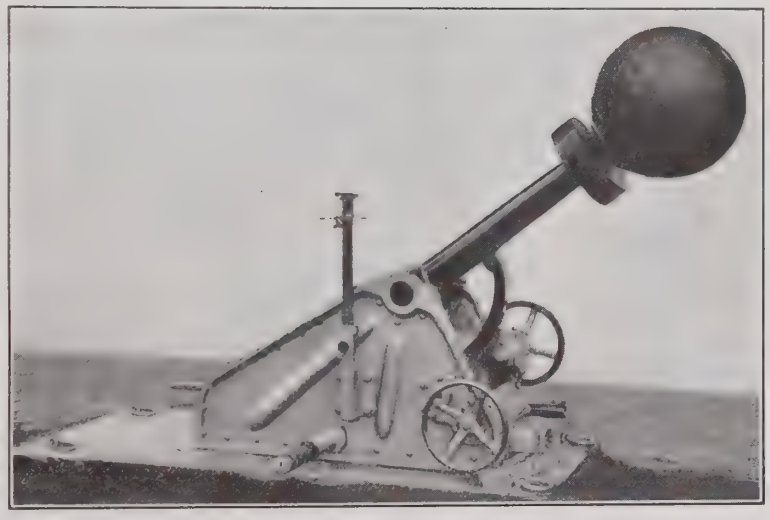
IT is claimed that a cure has been discovered for pellagra, the mysteriously enervating and deadly disease which has afflicted and destroyed so many, not only in our country, but in other parts of the world. The public health service at Washington announces the discovery that diet is at once the cause and the cure of pellagra, that it is not contagious or infectious, and that cure can be effected within four weeks by proper eating. The scientists and physicians of the world have been busy investigating this disease to find its cause and cure, but heretofore to no avail. So many of the colored people of the South were destroyed by it that it was claimed that it was the corn-meal having a tendency to fermentation that caused the malady. In Italy the disease was deadly, and was attributed to the corn-meal used almost universally by the poorer people, and in other parts of Europe to a lack of vital force in the food eaten by the peasantry; but they could only guess, while the malady spread. The credit for the discovery of the cure is given to Surgeon Goldberger, of the public health service, who with Director W. F. Lorenz of the Wisconsin psychiatric institute and several assistants has been at work for a long time in the study of the problem. Finding pellagra in countries that did not use corn-meal at all, the theory that corn produced the trouble was discarded as invalid. The discovery that this disease is dietary, rather than due to specific organism, is of world-wide interest, and more important still is the announcement that the disease can be cured by the eating of proper kinds of food. Pellagra, in its debilitating, stupefying and deadly influence, is a type of sin, the disease of the soul, a correct diagnosis of which has been made in the Gospel, and a certain cure for which is furnished in the Great Physician who came to restore health to those physically as well as spiritually diseased, and of whom it is said:

And he received them, and spake unto them of the kingdom of God, and healed them that had need of healing. (Luke 9: 11.)

Wireless Telephone Successful

AFTER experiments with a new wireless telephone device on the roof of the Ministry of Marine Building in Rome on October 5, Guglielmo Marconi said the human voice had been heard distinctly nine miles away. The experiment was made in the presence of the King of Italy. The new invention is to be reserved for the war vessels at first, and it is understood that it will be used later in connection with the airships, as well as with those that navigate the sea. No fiction could be more strange than the facts of modern discovery in almost every department of thought and action, especially in the multiplication of the conveniences of living. It is not far back from the aeroplane and automobile to the old stage coach, nor from the wireless and wire telephone and telegraph to the postman on horseback. Any one receiving or sending a telegraph or telephone message ought not to hesitate in believing in the communication of the human spirit with God. We can talk with God by a wireless system of prayer through an atmosphere charged with faith. Christ set us the example, and then gave us the wireless message to send, which begins:

Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. (Matt. 6: 9.)



DEADLY GASES IN WARFARE

MUCH is written and much of nonsense is believed about the mysterious effect of chemical fumes discharged by a new French shell. Of all the incredible things said about the effect of the shell, this telegram sent out by a press bureau of Paris and printed in many American newspapers reaches the climax. "That the fumes of the famous French three-inch shell have a most deadly effect in an enclosed space is shown by a scene that met the eyes of the French penetrating a château occupied by the Germans, which they had just bombarded. Entering the drawing-room they found a company of Wurtemburgers petrified in action. Some were at the windows taking aim with their fingers still pressing the trigger, others were at the tables where they had been playing games with cards in their hands, while still others had cigarettes in their lips. An officer stood with his mouth open as if in the act of dictating an order, and all of the corpses looked absolutely lifelike." The French Government has forbidden the sale of absinthe, and yet it looks as though the Paris news agent must have gotten some of the brain-crazing intoxicant, and inflamed his imagination with such visions, or he may deliberately have set himself to the task of trying to hoodwink the world, a most reprehensible thing. There are enough strange things that are true that no paper need forge mysterious falsehoods and brand them as the truth. It is still to be learned if this form of ammunition is actually being employed in the war. Our picture shows a machine which is said to throw the round, gas-filled shell upward to explode near aircraft, the released gases overcoming the occupants. Other contrivances are said to be in use against infantry with ghastly results. The story from Paris of the effect of the chemical fumes of the war shell, and all other such stories remind us of those of whom the psalmist thus spoke: "They delight in lies." (Ps. 62: 4.)

State Stone in Washington Monument

THE unveiling of the Washington State stone in the Washington monument took place on October 1, on the 350-foot landing, just above which was set the sandstone tablet. The dedication occurred on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the ratification of the State constitution of Washington. The State stone was unveiled by Miss Hazel Jones, daughter of the senior United States senator for Washington. Senator Poindexter presided at the exercises. Franklin K. Lane, secretary of the interior, made the principal address, in which he said: "This monument is the uplifted arm of the nation, pointing to heaven, by which every American swears a loyalty that will be as lasting as the stone itself to democracy." The exercises were closed with prayer by Rev. F. J. Prettyman, chaplain of the Senate. Material things are valuable only as they incarnate and express thoughts and sentiments. The Washington monument stands for all that is highest in patriotism, bravery, sacrifice, and that is most manly in individual character. The people of Washington State have done a timely and grateful thing in unveiling the tablet. The Bible speaks of a national monument Joshua built, and of which he said:

These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever. (Josh. 4: 7.)

Woman Aids Archeologist

MRS. J. S. KENNEDY has just provided the means for the continuation of the excavations of the celebrated archeologist, Sir William Mitchell Ramsay, who since the year 1880 has been digging amid the ruins of Asiatic Turkey, corroborating the Bible history of the work of St. Paul in that territory. Sir William has laid the Christian world under lasting obligation to him. He had been recently at work digging amid the ruins of Antioch, in Pisidia, and has made some wonderful discoveries. The war halted him temporarily, and when the government made way for the continuance of his work the rich nobleman who had furnished him the means for his excavations died, and had failed to make any provision for further help in his will. Mrs. Kennedy, who is a devout believer in the Scriptures, and follower of Christ, has supplied ample means to continue this important work. The entire Christian world is interested in all explorations that promise to add to and make clearer our Scriptural knowledge. The furtherance of such work is highly commendable. Sir William Ramsay found the forum at Antioch practically the same as when Paul and Barnabas visited the city.

He brought him unto Antioch. And it came to pass that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch. (Acts 11: 26.)

Nation Prays for Peace

IN every city, village and country-place, wherever there is a house of worship, prayers were offered for peace in Europe on Sunday, October 4. There were important services in New York, and William Jennings Bryan made two addresses, one in the morning at Carnegie Hall and the other at night in the Broadway Tabernacle. At night thousands were turned away, unable to get into the tabernacle. President Wilson attended the Central Presbyterian Church in Washington. Rev. James H. Taylor offered a prayer that the United States might be instrumental in restoring peace to Europe, and that Mr. Wilson might receive wisdom and strength as a mediator among the warring nations. In his sermon, Mr. Taylor asserted that the war in Europe meant not the breaking down of Christianity, but the failure of some people to follow Christian principles. He said that permanent peace would come when the nations of the world turned more to prayer. The president remained for the communion at the close of the service. America on its knees is a beautiful picture to heaven, and must have some impression in Europe. Our Father heard the nation's prayer. Our national day of prayer was in harmony with the words of the psalmist:

Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. (Ps. 122: 6, 7.)

OPEN-AIR MEETING IN INDIA

FRIENDS may gather some idea of one feature of our work in India if I tell them of a street meeting we held the day before yesterday.

It was Market Day (Shandy Day), and from dawn to sunset hundreds of people crowded the enclosure; I suppose at the busiest times there would be four or five thousand people present. Rich and poor, townsman and villager, rubbed shoulders, as from stall to stall they made their week's purchases. The sellers were mostly from distant villages.

What an opportunity these market days throughout India present for the preaching of the Gospel, the distribution of tracts, and the selling of Scripture portions! But I fancy there is nowhere near so much bazaar (street) preaching in India as there used to be. And yet it is almost the only way that Christian workers can get into touch with very many of the people of the country.

I was impressed the other day by the fact that Roman Catholics do not engage in street preaching. I have never seen them holding an open-air meeting in India.

After an hour or two in the market, here and there buttonholing a man, talking to many people of different races, and distributing all our stock of tracts and Gospel portions, we gathered for preaching just outside the market gates. We numbered about a dozen workers in all. One played a violin, one tapped the triangle, while Brother Bhai manipulated his small but loud-sounding cymbals.

As we sang and played a nice crowd gathered round us, and after prayer, Brother Bhai began to talk to the people. He knew his hearers. Many of them were servants to Europeans, and he talked to them of their difficulties, their temptations, their sins, describing some of their acts of theft with such truth, and in such detail, that in turn they smiled, or nodded acquiescence. Every few minutes he would sandwich his address with a verse or two of a hymn, almost always to a native tune. Then came the story of Calvary's Cross, told simply and in power, followed by a translation of that hymn so greatly used of God:

> Oh, the cross of Calvary,
> How sad yet glorious to me,
> Where my God on crimson blood,
> Died to save a sinner free.

How they listened! He must have preached the Gospel for three-quarters of an hour, yet I do not think half a dozen people left the crowd.

The writer followed, quoting a verse or two from the Word of God, and telling an incident of his sojourn in the Himalayas. In a lonely temple on a mountain peak he had met a Hindu "sadhu" (religious devotee), who said, "If I sin with my hand I finger my rosary over and over again to expiate the sin of my hand; if I sin with my feet, I take long pilgrimages to expiate the sin of my feet; and if I sin with my tongue, I say the word Ram (Hindu God) many thousands of times to expiate the sin of my tongue."

"But if you sin with your heart, sadhu, what do you do?" said the speaker.

"Alas! I do not know," replied the hermit. The moral was evident enough.

Mrs. Paynter then spoke. Women preachers are, alas! few and far between in India. First she told of the joy of the Christian in life and death, and compared the Christian's death to that of a Buddhist, and told of the dying bed scene of her own Buddhist grandmother. The old lady had reached her ninetieth year. She called her little granddaughter (Sister Paynter) to her bedside, and bade her reach from a shelf and bring to her her Pin Pota (Merit Book), in which were recorded all her many deeds of merit or charity, bidding her read from the book: so many meals given to the poor, so many silk robes given to the Buddhist priests, so many measures of oil given to the temple lamps, so many umbrellas and sandals given to the priests, etc., etc. But wearied and uncomforted, at length the poor old soul said: "Take it away. It doesn't help me now!" "None but Christ can satisfy," said the speaker, and urged her hearers to come to him and live.

Another hymn, and then a veteran warrior of the Cross, Captain Lynn, a retired military officer, spoke to the people of Jesus and his love. The captain is widely known and respected for his sterling Christian character. He was brought to Christ through the instrumentality of Father Taylor, or as he was known in America, "California Taylor." And here let me praise God for William Taylor. During the last thirty years, scattered up and down the whole of India, I have met men who spoke of William Taylor as their father in Christ. And without exception, they have been earnest, whole-hearted followers of the Lord Jesus. Lawyer Gordon in Madras, Parsee Mawockjee Modi and Trimbak Canaran in Bombay, Father La Personne in Bulsar and scores of others, soul-winners in the true apostolic succession—all of them converts of Bishop William Taylor. Sister Paynter remembers that, when quite a child, Bishop Taylor preached in her home in Ceylon. She remembers him singing a Singhalese translation of "We are bound for the land of the pure and the holy; will you go?"

O America, send us more men with the spirit of William Taylor, and keep at home those who have not his spirit—the spirit of the Master.

With an earnest prayer, offered up by Brother Bhai, the street meeting was brought to a close; but, in a sense, that meeting will never be closed, for Christ was lifted up, and we have the promise, "If I be lifted up . . . I will draw all men unto me."

Today we heard of a Hindu water-carrier, who listened from beginning to end. Meeting one of the little band of preachers later, he said: "Some one has been telling those preachers all about me. Their words cut my heart to pieces. They talked about me all the while, and described everything I did."

ANNUAL MOURNING FESTIVAL FOR HASSAN AND HUSSAIN

A very different street scene from that described above may be witnessed in India upon the recurrence of the Mohammedan festival of sacred mourning, in commemoration of the martyrdom of the grandsons of the Prophet Mohammed, Hassan and Hussain. Thousands of Mohammedans parade through the streets and beat their breasts as they celebrate this annual festival. Some fanatics even beat their breasts violently with knives, so that the flesh in many instances is laid bare. These fanatics collapse as the festival progresses and are then regarded with special favor. Carts with iced water follow the procession to revive and refresh the exhausted. At night, tabuts (structures of bamboo and paper resembling mosques) are taken to the chief mosque in pompous procession. Of late years low-caste Hindus and Mohammedans have, to the great sorrow of high-caste Mussulmans, converted the mourning into a general carnival. Small boys carry images of Hassan and Hussain through the streets during the festival.

THE CALL

BY ALICE GARLAND STEELE

Concluded

DOCTOR BARNES shut the office door quietly behind him. His mind was occupied with many things. He was in the grip, for the first time in his life, of new, unutterable tendernesses, emotions, outreachings, the stirrings of strange passions within him, strong and sweet. Before his eyes loomed the figure of a Ridge girl, sitting in a boat, with wind-blown hair. It was a snapshot his mother had sent him of Janet Neale.

He doubted if her picture alone would have done it. There was a man in the boat, a very presentable man, who knew how to sit at the tiller with his eyes on the girl feeding sheet. That was what had done it—the man.

A primeval force swept him. He knew things by their right names and he called it, without any hesitation, love. "I'm in love—I who never desired home, or wife, or child. I am in love! It's the call, I suppose, that comes to every man some time, the call of nature—and God!"

He never doubted that for the rest of his life it should rule him. It lured him home now, with a record of work well done behind him, a knowledge that he might take, with a clear conscience, a well-earned rest. He could marry Janet—strange to say, he never doubted that he could do so; he felt his instinct too strong to be gainsaid—he was the one woman, planned for him from the beginning of the world.

He went down to the end of the wharf and stared out over the bay. Little sails dotted it; tramp steamers were coming and going; a private yacht held anchorage not very far off—it was a new earth and a new sea, modern, Americanized, convincing, yet the old forces were there still, ready to spring at one's throat from behind discipline, and sanitation, and order—it was a place for a man to work in with sleeves rolled up and scant chance for a holiday! He threw his head back and laughed—nothing could keep him here now! He would not give up his work, he would devote to it his whole soul save only that which should belong to wife and home and children.

He thrilled as he pictured the future; his hearth, fire lighted, embers to burn through days of toil and weariness—the welcome of voices that hung on his voice, flesh of his flesh, life of his life—a man's whole fine sweep of inheritance! He would answer that call as every man did from the savage up through the ranks.

He turned back to the hospital with his pulses leaping to wild, sweet music. He would not wait a day longer. There was a steamer sailing at ten o'clock in the morning. He was going home!

He did not know it, but at that very hour his mother was with the Ridge girl in the parlor among the bits of cloisonné.

"My dear, in my last letter I sent him your picture. I have tried every other way—perhaps that will bring him home!"

"My picture—oh, why? Dear Mrs. Barnes—"

The older woman looked at her sadly. "We are both so lonely, my dear," she said.

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

WORLD'S BIGGEST SCHOOL-ROOM. The civic-industrial committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce is starting high school students of that city toward greater efficiency in civic and industrial lines, by inducing them to organize for the study of the districts in which they live. The clubs will make surveys of industrial and social conditions and will suggest remedies where needed. The city council, the courts and other departments, civic institutions and the business houses of the city will be visited in the course of this new line of educational work. The plan has many features and is comprehensive in its scope.

SHOOTING OFF SIZZERS IN MEXICO. Scattered bands of Carranzistas and Villistas have been discharging at each other some guns left over from the late unpleasantness in Mexico, but it seems doubtful if they will be able to start a real war all over again. The reported fighting reminds one of the day after the Fourth, as it was before the era of the safe and sane movement. United States troops were called out on October 7 to patrol the Arizona border lest armed Mexicans opposite Naco inadvertently cross the line in their excitement. Unfortunately, one or two Americans have been killed by stray bullets in the attempt to have a battle at Naco in Sonora, Mexico. Another serious side to the situation is the starving condition of the population in that town who have been cut off by the burning of the railroad bridges. Nevertheless, the administration at Washington is reported as being optimistic as regards Mexican developments.

NO BOUNDS TO THIS BOUNDARY DISPUTE. It is understood that the Republic of Panama will reject with scorn the award made by United States Supreme Court Justice White in the boundary dispute with Costa Rica inherited from Colombia, and will try direct persuasion on the latter country.

SEPTEMBER INCREASES OUR CROPS. The October 1 forecast of the Department of Agriculture shows a handsome gain over the estimates on September 1 in oats, potatoes, corn and apples, and a slight loss in wheat and barley. The prospects on the latter date were for a corn crop of 2,676,000,000 bushels; oats, 1,137,000,000; potatoes, 382,000,000; apples, 230,000,000. Winter wheat was as before, 675,000,000 bushels, spring wheat 217,000,000, as against 221,000,000 previously estimated.

NEW BATTLESHIPS FOR OLD. Two dreadnoughts, the largest yet designed for the United States navy, will be built at an approximate cost of $7,125,000 each, one at Newport News, Va., the other at New York, and will be named the Mississippi and the Idaho, taking the places of the two vessels, similarly named, which were sold to Greece last summer. These battleships will each have a displacement of 32,000 tons, with a length over all of 624 feet, a breadth of 97 feet 4½ inches, 30 feet draught, and a speed of 21 knots. They will be equipped with twelve fourteen-inch guns, four submerged submarine tubes and a torpedo defense battery of twenty-two five-inch rapid-fire guns. They will be propelled by turbines and fitted with oil-burning boilers.

CHICAGO THE SOFT-HEARTED. It seems that of the half-million dollars spent by Chicago yearly in relief work, among the pauper classes, about one-tenth goes to city employees who are on the payroll most of the year, and possibly forty per cent. of all families who receive aid are not worthy. This condition of things, as far as true, is attributed to lack of system, and the disclosure is expected to result in at least a lifting of hands in surprise and indignation. One pauper is said to have sent a thousand dollars to his home in his native land, the savings of many years of pauper thrift.

AN EXPERIMENTAL TRUCE. If the 100,000 workers in New York City belonging to the United Garment Workers of America can get along with the members of the American Clothing Manufacturers' Association for one year without strikes and lockouts—and they have agreed to do so as from September 28—it is reasonable to believe that the era of industrial peace will have been brought appreciably nearer. During this truce joint conferences of these bodies will seek to perfect a system of rules to permanently govern the relations of the workers and employers. Meanwhile disputes that may arise will be submitted for arbitration to a Clothing Trades Commission.

PROMINENT CHINAMAN TO STUDY AMERICAN POLITICS. Hwang Hsing, one of the leading spirits in the revolution in Southern China and once elected vice-president, has come to this country to make a thorough study of our form of government. In appearance and dress this visitor seems to typify a new China dominated by Western ideas and ideals, scarcely any of the familiar marks of the Orient being upon him; his traveling companions strengthen the impression.

CAUGHT IN THE WAR NET. If the House accepts the Senate's amended War Tax Bill, the following sources and evidences of wealth will pay the consequences to the extent of an estimated revenue to the government of $108,000,000: Beer, about $45,000,000; rectified spirits, say $5,000,000; stocks, bonds, deeds and transfers, bills of lading, Pullman car and steamship tickets, insurance policies (excepting life insurance and cooperative and mutual policies on property), all together about $30,000,000; patent medicines, perfumeries, cosmetics, $7,000,000, or thereabouts; and $21,000,000, or whatever is left to be raised to be levied on tickets to amusements, tobacco in all forms, and domestic wines.

CHOOSING SUCCESSOR OF BISHOP SCARBOROUGH. The New Jersey convention of Episcopal clergy and laymen at Trenton on October 7 elected Rev. Dr. Paul Matthews, dean of Faribault Cathedral, Minnesota, Bishop of New Jersey, to succeed the late Bishop Scarborough. This is the second effort to fill the post, as Bishop Charles H. Brent of the Philippines was elected some time ago but declined.

SKIMMED OFF THE TOPS OF THE NEWS COLUMNS. Vegetable Growers' Association of America 500 strong convenes in Philadelphia and plans better co-operation between producers and consumers.—New Federal Reserve Bank System appears likely to be ready for business by November 1.—Chicago has been added to the cities now having farm-to-consumer service by parcel post, the other cities being Atlanta, Baltimore, Birmingham, Boston, Cincinnati, La Crosse, Louisville, Lynn, Mass., Rock Island, St. Louis, San Francisco and Washington.—Carnegie Steel Company notifies employees in Pittsburg district of its wish to terminate the wage agreement under which the works have been run for fifteen years, because of the depression caused by the war.—Congress will probably adjourn as soon as war tax bill is passed, in all likelihood not to be called in special session in November.—The John D. Rockefeller Foundation with its backing of $100,000,000 will investigate industrial conditions throughout the world with a view to formulating principles of more harmonious relations between labor and capital.—The owner of Monticello, the home of Thomas Jefferson in Virginia, Representative Jefferson M. Levy of New York, in response to popular wish, offers to sell the property to the United States to be maintained as the Virginia home of the Presidents of the United States for occasional occupance, the price being $500,000, one-half the amount which he has paid upon it.

KING COTTON SNUBBED BY PRESIDENT. Insisting that there is ample currency to finance the cotton industry through the present crisis without the aid of Congress, President Wilson has refused to indorse a plan to issue $500,000,000 in Federal notes to be loaned to planters, but approves of the effort being made outside of Congress to organize a pool of $150,000,000 for the purpose of buying up the cotton crop at present prices. The foreign demand for cotton, as all the world knows, has been almost disastrously diminished by the war.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION ALLOTTED. Of the $20,000,000 which Secretary of War Carrison will expend in the maintenance of the country's waterways, five million will go into Mississippi River projects, one million for Columbia River needs in Oregon and Washington, the same amount on improvements on the Delaware River at Philadelphia, one and three-quarters million for locks and dams on the Ohio, three-quarters of a million on the Hudson at New York, and other sums on improvements elsewhere in New York, in New Jersey, Connecticut and other States.

PEACE ZONE SPREADING. The Republic of Ecuador announces its readiness to sign a treaty with the United States containing the now celebrated provision for a reference of all disputes to a commission before going to war. The same form of treaty has been tentatively signed by the German Ambassador Count von Bernstorff and forwarded by him to his government for ratification. Austria is also believed to be disposed toward such a treaty with this country.

HUMANE ASSOCIATIONS REVIEW WORK. The thirty-eighth annual meeting of the American Humane Association convened at Atlantic City, N. J., October 6, and learned that during the year past 191,964 children were cared for by the societies of the country, as against 177,747 the preceding year; the number of animals attended to increasing from two and a half million to over six million. An officer of the organization declared that whenever the S. P. C. C. comes into conflict with owners of mills and factories where children are employed, powerful political influences are brought into play against the societies. The entire fields of activity of societies for prevention of cruelty to children and for the prevention of cruelty to animals were discussed by experts. The S. P. C. A. of Pennsylvania have appointed October 25 as "Humane Sunday," throughout the State, when churches of all denominations are asked to preach upon humanitarianism in all its aspects.

JESUS OF NAZARETH ON TRIAL

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

[illegible] that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before her shearers is dumb; [illegible]" Isa. 53: 7.

The Lamb was the symbol of meekness, but we want to consider it as our example. No man ever spake as he spake, or could have spoken as he could have spoken, and he was silent. Surely we who have no such resources at our command, would do better [illegible]. Love to Jesus, and the love of Jesus in our hearts, will do this for us. Love does not blaze out in passionate anger, like a gunpowder explosion; it is [illegible]; she bears reproach meekly, that it may stop with her, as cannon-shot in sand. Besides, Peter tells us that it is an acceptable thing to God, if, from a sense of duty to him, we patiently submit to wrong, when treated unjustly. It is to this that we have been called: because Christ also suffered for this purpose, that he should leave us an example, and that we should follow in his steps. When he suffered he uttered no threats, because he left his wrongs in the hands [illegible]. Let us be advised!

The Trial of Jesus

By Arthur H. Haviland

THE charge against Jesus was not a civil or criminal charge, but ecclesiastical. He was accused of blasphemy. The high priest and Sanhedrin* had the right to decide whether or not he was guilty of this charge and to sentence him to death. But only the civil power represented by Pontius Pilate could execute the sentence. (John 18: 31.) Something like this method is noticed in the dreadful trials for heresy during the Middle Ages, and at the time of the Reformation. In Constance, for instance, one visits the cathedral in which the clergy convicted John Huss of heresy, but it was in the great Council Hall across the street that the reformer was sentenced by the civil authorities to be burned at the stake.

Later, when Jesus had to appear before Pilate himself, the rabble claimed that in declaring himself a king he had committed the civil crime of treason, saying: "Whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar." (John 19: 12.) But the charge that sent him to death was the charge of blasphemy, blasphemy because, in declaring himself to be the Son of God, he made himself equal with God, and because he had threatened, as they declared, to destroy the temple. In the statement which the "false witnesses" of our lesson reported, Christ had been referring to his body. (John 2: 19-21.) It is true that at another time he had prophesied that the time was coming when of the temple stones not one should be left standing upon the other. (Matt. 24: 2.) In Luke, however (chapter 19: 44), these words seem to have referred to the city as a whole, not to the temple buildings exclusively. This statement, even if directed against the temple, might not have impressed his enemies as blasphemy, because any one might prophesy that in some future siege of Jerusalem the temple would be laid waste as it had been in the past. But when they understood him to say that the temple should be destroyed, and that he himself would rebuild it in three days, they could not believe that he was speaking of the sacred building otherwise than with contempt.

We must not let the fact of the wickedness and unfairness of many of those who had a part in the condemnation of Jesus blind us to the other fact that his statements had attacked some of the principles which the Jews had been taught, through all the centuries of their national existence, to cling to with fiercest fierceness. It was maddening to them and in utter violation of their profoundest spiritual convictions that any man could declare himself to be a god. They had learned the lesson with bitter pain that "The Lord our God is one Lord." For a man to declare himself to be divine meant to them the most desperate blasphemy and idolatry. This was the great stumbling-stone upon which the Jews that day stumbled and fell.

On the Jewish day of Atonement recently celebrated, September 30, I stood in the midst of an excited crowd on Second Avenue, which was pressing in upon a restaurant which had insisted upon keeping open on this sacred day. Business on the avenue was locked up tight. Padlocks proclaimed the complete suspension of business during the sacred hours. Shop after shop stood still and shut. But one restaurant had dared to defy the conscience of the East Side, and stood open for business. This was more than the Orthodox Jews could endure, and crowds of them stood all day fuming before the open door which violated their sacred sense of duty. We cannot tell how many souls in the mob that stormed about the innocent Saviour were really led to their opposition by some such mistaken idea of sacred right. They could not surrender their ancient ideas of the Jehovah of Israel to bow down to this Nazarene.

But after all there were two deeper reasons why these Jews hated Jesus and wished to put him out of their sight. The first was that although with their lips, and to a certain extent with their reason, they were loyal to Jehovah, yet after all in their hearts they did not love him and did not wish to keep his law. Those rare souls among the Jews, like Anna and Simeon, and Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, the company of faithful eleven and the still larger circle of intimate friends among whom were such devout souls as Mary and Martha and Lazarus, were sure that in giving homage to Jesus they were not being untrue to the command to worship God alone. In some indefinable way they realized that he was God indeed, and that in worshiping him they were worshiping the Jehovah of old. These were the real friends of God who loved him truly and who welcomed him when he came. The crowd professed to know him and to love him, but their hearts were so far from him that when he came they hated him. Here we come at the real original trouble with every individual soul. The difficulty with us is that we do not like God. And our life is wrong and mistaken until that is changed and we come to love him. That is what the new birth means of which Jesus spoke so earnestly to Nicodemus. He came to show the world what God is like and to win their hearts to his love. A few welcomed him; the rest cast him out.

The other difficulty was that the whole life and spirit and message of Jesus stood not only for a life of actual communion with God, but for a life of unselfish service for others. This too, is a distasteful proposition to the natural man. Because the Jews of his day were not willing to give up their program of self-seeking and gain for lives of self-sacrifice and humble service they rejected him and the new paths to which he called them.

Every day Jesus is on trial in our

"The Cap on the Lens"

By Amos R. Wells

LAST week we studied Judas; this week, Jesus. From Judas to Jesus! It is like leaping from darkness to light. Have you ever watched the moon through an opera-glass? The new moon shows the ragged edge of great mountains and immense hollow craters, the black shadows eating into the narrow sickle of brightness. As the moon turns to the sun during the next two weeks the shadows shorten, the craters disappear, and at full moon all these imperfections are swallowed up in the splendor of the reflected sunlight. Thus it is when we turn from contemplating sinful man and look into the face of the Sun of Righteousness.

But here was Judas, so close to Jesus; and here were the brutal Roman soldiers that came to arrest him; and here were the bigoted Pharisees that accused him and the false witnesses that lied about him, and the Sanhedrin that beat down all evidence in their angry determination to convict—these were all near to Jesus, and looked squarely at him. How was he not the Sun of Righteousness to them?

Dr. Jowett has a sermon on prejudging Christ. "A tiny obliquity in a lens," he says, "can make the outlook grotesque." This flaw in the Pharisees' lens was their over-emphasis on externals. They looked at Christ's home, and said, "Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet." They looked at his teachings, and found that he healed on the Sabbath, that he ate without ceremonial ablutions, that his disciples did not fast. They looked at his companions, and found that they were fishermen, publicans, outcasts. They looked at the state of this self-claimed Messiah, and found him poor as the poorest, and backed up not even by a single armed band. Most of all, they did not want to see the Christ in Jesus, for his words rebuked their hypocritical lives. So, as Dr. Jowett says, not only was their lens full of flaws that distorted their image of him, but they kept the cap on! No wonder they could not see the divine glory.

But we must not forget that, even when they came to arrest Jesus in the Garden, they fell backward to the ground before his realized majesty and power; yes, even the Roman soldiers; yes, even Judas. Nor must we forget that even in the Sanhedrin were Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea. Nor must we forget that out of this nest of bigots, a Pharisee of the Pharisees, came that Christian of the Christians, the magnificent Paul.

Light has use, even if men cannot or will not see it. Baring-Gould tells of an institution for the blind that was built in England without windows. "Why," argued the committee, "should we provide windows for those that cannot see out of them?" So scientific ventilation and heating were provided, but the walls were left unpierced by any pane of glass. But soon the poor inmates grew pale, and a great languor fell upon them. They were restless and dissatisfied. They fell sick, and one or two died. Then it was that the committee decided to open windows in the walls. In came the healing light, and the human plants responded to it at once in revived spirits, ruddy cheeks, and restored health. Light is good, the Light of the World is good, even for those who shut their eyes.

In the darkness of that trial scene one flash of light streams out, Jesus' assertion of his Messiahship. "I am the Son of God," he solemnly declared; and with the next breath he called himself "the Son of man." "There is an ancient Jewish legend," says Bishop McDowell, "that the true pronunciation of the name of God has been lost, and that whoever recovers it will hold in his hand the secrets of nature and the hearts of men. It is more than a legend. There came one who did pronounce the Eterna' Name with true filial accent." That .ame is Love. It is Majesty, sitting at the right hand of power, but it is also Love that does not shrink from being the Son of man. Alas for the caps on our telescopes that keep us from seeing this great light!

Echoes From the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

AN Arab saying often quoted in this part of the world is: "One hour of justice is better than a thousand hours of worship." As nations decay, the signs of death appear in the great fundamental principles of justice; the facility with which men are thrown into prison on false charges, countercharges, followed by all the kindred evils of false witness, bribery, perjury. I have known a thousand cases where men have been thrown into prison and have in rare cases only heard their guilt or innocency discussed. The first and only question that rises is: How shall we get free from the clutches of the government? Which means the unrighteous and unholy officials who pervert the law and turn it into a system of oppression and means of gain. Oaths mean nothing and perjury is treated as a trifle.*

During the long years of Sultan Abd-el-Hamid's reign he refused ever to sign the death warrant of any one convicted in his courts. Some said he was hindered by a personal superstition, but it was much more likely that he knew too much about his own courts of justice, and would not risk visiting the death penalty on an innocent man. Since the promulgation of the new constitution, three or four men have been actually hanged in Beirut, but in the most recent execution the judge refused to sign the death warrant.

More serious than murder has been the charge of blasphemy or lèse majesté during the latter years of Abd-el-Hamid's reign. A word against the prophet Mohammed, the faith of Islam or the Sultan himself, at the mouth of any two witnesses, false or true, was enough to throw the most exalted person into prison, where he might remain a month or a year and spend all he was worth before getting a release. More than one of our Protestant preachers tasted the bitterness of this false charge.

It was on the ground of blasphemy that Christ was handed over for execution by the Romans. His enemies, the Scribes and Pharisees, had the privilege of settling the charge and pronouncing the sentence, but the Roman governor was the only one who could carry it out. He tried to clear his own skirts by delivering Jesus to the Jews to be crucified, but he furnished the soldiers and was morally and legally guilty. Roman law, in the abstract, was great, but Roman justice in the more remote provinces and in Judea, among the turbulent Jews and under Pontius Pilate, became a travesty.

* The evil of false charges and facility of countercharges in Oriental courts and lands is illustrated by an incident which came under my notice some years ago. A famous oldfashioned teacher of a boy's school was approached by a number of angry pupils whom he had surprised quarrelling. One of the crowd charged his playmate with biting him on the ear. Mualim Tirrin in stern tones and with fierce looks seized the culprit and shook him, asking what he meant by such doglike conduct. To his surprise the boy replied: "I did not bite him on the ear. He bit his own ear."

The Ever-Inviting Dish

You'll Find No Other Like It

The appeal of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice is resistless—as a million people know.

The looks are an invitation.

Here are bubble-like grains, shaped as they grew, puffed to eight times normal size.

Who ever saw a food more tempting than these brown, crisp, airy morsels?

At a touch of the teeth, the thin walls crush to granules. And they melt away, leaving behind an almond flavor—a taste like toasted nuts.

Have you ever known another grain food with so many fascinations?

Never-Ending Welcome

When first you serve them you think that their newness entices. But the hundredth serving proves just as attractive.

When you serve with cream and sugar, you think they are best-liked in that way. But when you serve them floating in bowls of milk you say, "That's how my folks prefer them."

You serve them dry—like peanuts. You use them in candy making, or as garnish for ice cream. And each way seems the best.

You serve one and then another—Wheat, Rice, Corn—and the last one served seems better than the rest.

But your only conclusion is that any Puffed Grain is as good as a cereal can be.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

CORN PUFFS 15¢

This is the process—Prof. Anderson's process—which every grain food should go through. But some grains can't be puffed.

Here every food granule is exploded by steam—fitted for easy digestion. And no other process does that.

So these best-liked foods are the best-cooked foods. Serve all of them and in various ways. They supply you an endless variety.

The Work Verse*

WHATSOEVER thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.

It is impossible to discuss this problem of doing work eagerly without opening up that other question of doing it cheerfully. To be cheerful in the "whatever" work one finds, but found with it not easily to be done that way. If we can solve the problem of doing work cheerfully we shall have solved the problem of doing it rightly.

Now to this end, look—that is one of life's great truisms. Here are the elements of delight and sickness. Nothing is more delightful than to lose oneself in work one loves; nothing is more distressing than to be forced after hour to do work one hates.

It has been stated that during a recent investigation of industrial conditions in Baltimore a desperately large percentage of laborers declared that they hated their work. The statement would doubtless be true to almost all industrial workers. By ignorance conditions can be made which are forced upon a system that compels men year after year to give their strength to work they hate.

But for the individual man, what shall he do? The writer will never forget a small boy he met in Ely who happened into the evening choir-rehearsal that he had started to many months that he really got so he liked to work there. This was a choir composed of "professional tenors" that the principal is like. Make up your mind you are going to do a thing whatever you like it or not, and very often the distaste of it will disappear. You remember how practice it used to be to some handsome girl a field of stubble, but if you were to wear many. Trouble which started and ended right there and studied patiently beneath a tree, determined and nearly tactless as to many cases, the actual doing of a task will often make the dislike of it. Be diligent as the bees to do a task well and promptly, as one begins and grows to like grow to doing it, just a habit runs second nature.

Here are a few simple rules: (1) If it is possible, find a task to do that you really love. If such a task does not come at once, do not be impatient. Be and faithful and prepare the way that must be done now, but do and give up the time that the day will come when you can devote yourself with pleasure to the work that you really love. Then God and duties, opportunities and inspirations cluster to inform servants, but despised and ignored. Watch and find your niche in life, prepare earnestly for it, and those are the industrial of this work you were meant to do and that, in the end, do best. (2) If you can't do the latter task now, take the assigned task happily and cheerily as your best, and with your face set on your purpose. Have confidence and faith and accuracy and thoroughness, and the spirit of "whatever thy hand finds" will do you—and the world—good. (3) If you cannot find the former task, have your work for the present, love your work for the sake of the work itself—"for the work's sake." (4) If you cannot do the present, love your work for the sake of the wages it brings you. That kind of "doing whatever you do" is not heathen nonsense when the motive which is behind it is honest, according to your conscience. "Do your work well as to the Lord." (5) Then, as well, as will great success. Whether we like our work, or whether we do not, we shall be happier and more successful if we do it well. Whatever we do, we should do it, as we do it well, and only because we love those things and because we want to help them for the sake.

The Root of Murder†

HOW like the committee who wonder and touch like subject to be studied on this day dreamed that when the lad came around millions of men to Europe would be confronted by the ghastly business of scientifically slaughtering one another. "Thou shalt not kill"—plain word of God, that has rung in the ears all men for more than four thousand years, blossomed for almost half that time, by the sin and filth and massacre of Jesus, of Nazareth, God's Son! Yet this year of grace, nineteen hundred and fourteen, this year in which the world ought to understand better than ever before Christ's measure of love, will go down in history marked by the beginning of what already has face to be the world's greatest, bloodiest and cruelest war.

It looks as though man would have to begin all over again to learn not to kill each other.

There are two great words in life but in Scripture standing for things that lead to murder—Envy and Hate. Envy means that one person wants something another has got. This desire to possess what another has leads to practically all the strife in the world. The matter begins with no particular hatred; but as the first man meets resistance in trying to get something away from the second man, he arrives harder and harder, and soon comes to hate the one he cannot overcome.

But hatred can arise from other causes than envy. The world is full of all sorts of personal, national and national antagonisms, many of them entirely incomprehensible. And hatred, no matter what its cause, may lead if not checked, to murder. Murder is indeed carried to its highest power. That is the most that hate can do—kill the object of hatred. So John makes the solemn statement: "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer" (1 John 3: 15.)

One other word should be added to these two—"Anger." This was the hard saying of Jesus: "Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not kill. But I say unto you, that every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment." These easy words "without a cause" were slipped into later manuscripts, and do not seem to be the earliest and best. There is such a thing as holy anger. For it is said that Jesus had angry. What is the difference between holy and unholy anger? We are all reading from the facts in the case of Jesus. He was not angry when men were mistreating and abusing him. Persecution and torture awoke only pity and forgiveness. But when he saw people hindering his own works of love for others he was angry. (Mark 3: 5.) Notice that he was grieved and angered at the same time. In other words, holy anger has no selfishness in it; it is always stirred by love, and by love. So we come back to hatred as the great opposite of love.

How to avoid murder, then? Learn to love. Learn to love as Jesus loved. Learn how to yield the heart to him so completely that everything but love shall be eliminated. Then hatred, selfish anger—those are awful things. And to overcome is usually for us, Jesus has promised a way by which these sins may be removed from every life. That is his joke for saving and redeeming the world.

THE WAR OF ARMAGEDDON

IN a notable article in the October number of the Christian Statesman, of Pittsburg, Pa., Professor Richard C. Wylie* discusses the present war in Europe with reference to its relation to prophecy, and especially to the Armageddon world-conflict, foretold in Rev. 16: 12-16. Professor Wylie, who has devoted much study to the subject of prophecy and is regarded as an authority, writes that while the word Armageddon means war, the particular war involved "may be protracted through a number of years. It would also be a mistake to suppose that the war is entirely a war in the literal sense, involving slaughter on the field of battle." It includes war in nature, as evidenced in great storms, earthquakes, etc.; it also includes war against and "the complete overthrow of organized political and ecclesiastical iniquity, primarily in its papal, but also in all its other forms."

Concerning the forces engaged, Professor Wylie writes:

"ROMAN emperors usurped divine prerogatives and had themselves worshiped as divine. This same spirit is not yet extinct. It shows itself among some of the warring powers today. In the beast which is Antichrist in its civil form, we see the claim and exercise of civil prerogatives without due recognition of the divine source from which they spring. It is godless civil government; the exercise of civil functions, which may in some measure be legitimate, but which are claimed to originate wholly with man. This spirit is likewise dominant among all of those engaged in the present strife. The false prophet we have seen is to be identified with the beast from the earth, and is the papal power, especially as it claims universal dominion both in the ecclesiastical and in the civil realm. It matters not that the Pope, who is said to have died of a broken heart because of the war, was opposed to the gathering of the nations for this conflict. The spirit which produced the papacy is the same as that which produced the claims of some of the world rulers today, and is the same as that which has brought on the war.

"Without attempting just now to fix the blame for the war on any one nation or ruler, we are able to discover the spirit by which all the nations of the world are more or less actuated, and which, under certain conditions, will inevitably lead to war.

"These considerations are all in favor of the view that the war of Armageddon is now in progress. The spirit that brings on the war is that by which the nations of the world are today governed.

"The next point claiming our attention is the world-wide nature of the conflict. The parties in the conflict are the kings of the whole world. It is significant that the Greek term here rendered 'world' is the one which denotes the inhabited earth. Certainly there was never a war in which so many nations were involved, or in which such vast armies were placed on the field of battle. While there are nations not yet directly involved, all are directly affected, and no one knows how soon others may be drawn into the bloody conflict. And as will be shown presently, when we consider that the war of Armageddon is not merely a war with death-dealing weapons, but a war also in the intellectual, the moral and the religious world, it will be readily seen that such a war is, and has for some time been in progress.

"THE fourth, and in some respects the most important thing to be considered, is the issue involved. It is called the war of the great day of God the Almighty. What this means will presently appear. Let us first inquire concerning the significance of the term 'Armageddon,' the name by which the war is called. Megiddo is a town in Palestine on the western edge of the great plain of Esdraelon. To the north, west and south are the hills of Palestine, one of which probably took the name of Megiddo. It was here that the decisive victory was gained by Deborah and Barak over Sisera.

"This same plain has been the gathering place at different periods for almost all nations and many other battles have here been fought. It is also significant that this plain belongs to the region in which the greater part of the ministry of Jesus Christ was performed. The name, therefore, is significant and doubtless denotes the final struggle for supremacy. It would be a grave mistake to suppose that on this very plain a final battle between the forces of right and wrong must be fought. There is no one battlefield where this last struggle will occur. In a sense the field is everywhere on this planet where men live. The literal war is only one phase of the struggle. After men cease to kill one another in battle strife there will still be a strife in the intellectual world for the settlement of the real issues involved. The description of the war as the war of the great day of God the Almighty, clearly points to the fact that the issue relates to the rights of God. It is the question of supremacy over this planet."

PROFESSOR WYLIE then proceeds: "The last thing to be considered is the termination and result of the conflict. Briefly stated, it is the fall of Babylon and the establishment of the reign of righteousness on the planet. The fall of Babylon signifies the overthrow of organized evil, both civil and ecclesiastical, especially as it is known in the form of the papacy and anti-Christian civil government. . . . The inspired description of the war of Armageddon does not say that the righteous and the unrighteous will be arrayed against each other on the field of battle. The issue there is not directly between Christ and Satan, or a human representative of Satan. It will result, however, in the failure of any and every nation and government to gain the supremacy over all the rest. It will result also in the downfall of all tyrannous forms of civil government. All the thrones of Europe are today tottering and seem about ready to fall. After their fall will come the period of free government, patterned after the Divine plan. . . . The war now raging, even if it is the war of Armageddon, is only one aspect of it. This aspect is the most spectacular, the most dreadful and the most appalling aspect, but it is not the most important. The real issue is to be fought out and settled in the arena of intellectual debate. Here the issue is already joined between the forces of righteousness and unrighteousness. The question is, whether Christianity is to be the one religion of the race, or whether other religions are to be recognized as equally good; whether Christ is to be the sole King of men, or whether he is to divide the dominion with the devil; whether the nations are to organize their governments in subjection to the King of kings, or whether secular, anti-Christian government is to continue.

"As near as we can determine the times and the seasons and the characteristics of the war of Armageddon it seems that it is now in progress. The strife during all the past ages has been a strife for supremacy, but Armageddon differs from all that precedes it in that it is the greatest conflict of all, is final, and results in the failure of all anti-Christian efforts and in the establishment of the reign of Jesus Christ over all the nations of the earth."

IT was six o'clock at the hospital, and there were lights in the doctors' dining-room. Young Barnes, hanging his hat on a peg in the hall, was accosted by an orderly.

"Some one to see you, Dr. Barnes, in the pavilion."

"To see me?" the doctor frowned; "what's the name, Lansing?"

"He wouldn't give a name, sir, but he's been here twice asking for you. I think he's a missionary for some one of these countries."

The doctor whistled softly. "Well—he'll have to wait, I want my dinner!"

On second thought he turned abruptly and went toward the gloom of the pavilion. It was screened in, and the posts of light bamboo were twined with moon-flowers, climbing high on silver stems.

The doctor, peering into the shadows, made out a tall, dark figure in black, above it a face holding something foreign, yet familiar.

"Good evening," the doctor spoke curtly, yet in some sort with respect as he took the card the other held out to him—

REV. PEREZ ALOYSIUS GUINALDO,
Puerto Cabello, Venezuela.

"I do not know you, sir, but I am Dr. Barnes."

The missionary bowed, using excellent English: "I have come a long way to see you, Doctor Barnes."

"What can I do for you?"

"Nothing for me, sir, much for Puerto Cabello."

"You come from Venezuela, but you speak like an American?"

The missionary smiled. "My State was California, but I went to Venezuela eighteen years ago."

"Ah!" They sat down on the little wicker chairs.

"I have come on a mission now," said the man. He spoke with a fine measure of calm.

"I hardly think I understand."

"Eleven months ago," said the missionary, "you treated a Puerto Cabellan for fever—he was employed on the canal. A few weeks afterward you treated another man, a negro from the Orinoco, for a disease which is little known here—it is something like Chagres fever, but more deadly. You cured him."

The doctor frowned. "I remember," he said shortly; "I had a case of it in Cuba also."

"We have it," said the missionary calmly, "in Puerto Cabello all the year round. I told you I was on a mission, doctor, and it is true—the mission is to you.

"We want you to come out to Puerto Cabello to help us fight that disease—that, and other things. I am here, authorized to ask you to go back with me to establish a hospital, and to remain there, as its head. We need sanitation there, doctor, as much as you needed it here on the Isthmus—and I will say this much for what we are asking you to do—it's God's work!"

Dr. Barnes stretched his arm along the inner rail—he felt very tired! "I am not of your church," he said.

The missionary smiled. "We have much in common, we are both trying to teach the human race to bear its burdens—isn't that enough?"

The doctor raised his head. "I appreciate it," he said, "your offer—but I cannot go.'

The missionary surveyed him quietly. "You are not needed here, Dr. Barnes, as much as my people need you."

"That is not the question."

"Don't make it a question. Think of it as a call for you to answer. God's call, voiced through his poor prophet!"

Dr. Barnes got up abruptly. "I'll put it another way," he said, "I will not go!"

"Ah!"

There was finality in each man's utterance.

"Listen," said the doctor, "I'll bare my heart to you—I am going home tomorrow."

The missionary repeated the word softly. "Home!"

"Yes, home," said the young man sternly. "I have heard, all my life, calls of one sort or another, and answered them—the sea, Cuba, a pesthole filled with Chinamen—I've gone and done, each time, my level best. Now I've turned in my tracks—I am going home."

The missionary pressed his lips together sadly. "That is a call too," he aid. "I have heard it out on the desert, in the wilderness; it is the greatest call on earth but one, that call of home!"

Dr. Barnes did not seem to hear him. "I am sailing tomorrow at ten," he said, "and I go with a clear conscience. I am leaving no duty undone. And you speak the truth—I am answering the greatest call on earth—I am going to marry the girl I love!"

The other man straightened his tall black figure. "Then there is nothing further I can say," he said, "except God go with you, my brother."

Dr. Barnes bent his head stiffly.

"Or as we say in my country, 'Vayan Uds. con Dios'—for if God go with a man," the missionary said softly, "the man will be sure to go, sooner or later, with God!" He bowed and departed swiftly into the darkness.

Dr. Barnes, with the light of battle in his eyes, turned on his heel and went to the telephone operator sitting at the little booth in the hall.

"Call up the offices of the steamboat," he said, "and engage one outside stateroom on the boat leaving tomorrow at ten o'clock, and if you see Lansing, send him up to my quarters, will you? I've got to pack everything I own in an hour."

He went obstinately upstairs. He had quite forgotten his dinner!

IT WAS five o'clock in the evening. Sunshine had faded from the Ridge, but there was still in the room the faint light the girl had grown to love best. She got up from her low chair by the window, and with her hands locked behind her went and stood before a framed etching, an interior of the Cathedral of Chartres—it showed the clear white marble of the high altar, and the delicate Gothic arches swung above it.

The girl's face was full of brooding happiness. She had heard from his mother that morning that he was home! It seemed somehow enough happiness just to feel that she would look at him once in a while as he went his rounds, for the word came that he was to open an office on the Ridge itself! The door opened behind her, and she turned quickly, her head at a charming angle.

"Dr. Barnes—!"

He came in and closed the door behind him, and he stood against it, gravely surveying her. He seemed at once to her changed, unreal—his look was one of brooding also, but oh, not of happiness! And yet—

She said again more faintly, "Dr. Barnes—"

Had she known it, he was wearing the face of boyhood; the old mysterious vision had come back to dwell in his short-sighted eyes!

"Listen," he said, "listen, and don't speak to me till I am through! I have come all the way from Panama to tell you that—I love you!"

She sank on a chair before him with a sense of exquisite shock. Her lips parted tremulously, but even had he not sealed them, they would still have been dumb!

"I love you," he said. His voice had taken on a note she had never heard, and it thrilled her to sudden ecstasies. "I came to ask you—to marry me, but I find—I must not do that! Something has come to me—since yesterday—that will prevent it."

His words held no alarm for her; something sure and steadfast under

Systematic Bible Study

Bible Lovers and Christian Workers

The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago offers five courses by correspondence in Bible Study and Christian Doctrine to those unable to attend the regular courses of the Institute. The well known Scofield Correspondence Course is now owned by the Institute and this together with its own four strong courses offer

Systematic Instruction in Evangelism, Sunday School Teaching and Methods of Christian Work

Most thorough work may be done by correspondence. Correspondence work for many reasons offers greater possibilities for culture than does class work. The courses of the Institute are very instructive and Bible lovers will find them most interesting, economical and easy to follow.

them kept her still smiling mutely, as her shapely hands clasped and unclasped themselves in her lap. He had spread his arms out against the woodwork of the paneling, and she thought dimly that he was making the shape, as he stood there, of a cross—she stirred a little, and then became very still.

"All my life," he said brokenly, "I have been hearing voices—first the voice of war and romance and mystery, and then—the sea—and then my profession, which has led me to hear so many, many other voices that I might not otherwise have heard—cries of birth, and death, of pain, and every kind of misery—I have tried to answer them all! Then I heard yours—you called me, out there in Panama, to come back to you, to build up a home for you and me, where our children might play and grow strong, and always, after I have gone away, I want you to know this—that I came at your call! Will you remember—

She nodded. Thick tears stood in her eyes.

"But I cannot stay with you," he hurried on. "I am going back—not to Panama again, but still farther! A preacher chap came all the way from a fever-ridden city on the coast—off in Venezuela—they need a hospital out there, and they want me! Dear—it is good work, without much glory. I used to think I wanted something big, and fine, and unusual, to give my life to—now I know it's not to be that at all; the call hasn't come to me for that kind of thing, and I'm not to leave my mark on history—I am just always to keep on going—where I'm most needed!"

She spoke then, very faintly, smiling at him through her tears. "Your mother called you Samuel," she said, "and Samuel always made the same answer: 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth!'"

His own eyes were a little dim. "I'm not good that way—at all. I'm only—not a quitter! I want to do my duty—so I am going back—alone."

She stood up with a little cry. "Not alone," she said, "oh, never alone again!"

His look leaped to her swiftly, and stayed at the challenge of her true, brave eyes. "You mean—" he said.

She went over to him and spead her arms out over his—

"Where thou goest, I will go," she quoted steadily, "where thou lodgest I will lodge, and where thou diest, there also will I be buried! Dear heart," she ended, "you must let me answer my call, too!"

China has protested to the United States concerning the violation of her neutrality by Japan; the seizure of one of the Marshall Islands by the Japanese fleet has also attracted some attention in Washington. Both Japan and Great Britain disclaim any idea of any permanent occupation of these islands by Japan, but at first sight the occupation does not appear in harmony with the pledges given by these powers as to the limitation of Japan's sphere of action. These islands are located in the Pacific, nearly opposite the western entrance of the Panama Canal, and in striking distance of Hawaii.

The joint expedition of Japan and Great Britain against the German East Asiatic colony of Kiauchau is not making very rapid progress. There have been several land and naval engagements near the town during the last few days, which have resulted in some loss of life, but the siege itself has not yet really begun.

The action of Turkey in closing the Dardanelles has occupied considerable of the attention of the Allies during the last week. Before closing the straits the Turkish fleet was moved into the Black Sea. It is reported that the Allies intend to take some concerted action in the near future to compel Turkey to reopen the Dardanelles; such action will probably precipitate a crisis.

Nothing has happened recently which tends to make the ultimate position of either Rumania or Italy any clearer. In Rumania, it is said, the cabinet, at its recent meeting, determined to maintain an attitude of neutrality, though the king was in favor of positive action in favor of the Triple Alliance. In Italy, it is said, there will shortly be changes in the cabinet, which will tend to clear up the situation there. There appears to be no positive news of mobilization in that country; it has been reported as having been ordered several times and the reports immediately denied, so that it is a little hard to know what has actually occurred.

Bulgaria's final attitude is also a little of a mystery. The most conflicting reports come from that quarter, and so conflicting as not even to afford the vaguest clue to her future action.

As regards all three of these countries, I should not be at all surprised if they continued neutral, providing Turkey does so as well. But any action by that power would probably precipitate action by the others.

The first of Great Britain's colonial troops, some 32,000 Canadians, reached England during the past week. The cables inform us that they are to be sent to a training camp for a couple of months before being put in the field. The Australian contingent will probably be the next to arrive.

After much study of the map, I have, I think, gotten a fairly clear idea of the lines now occupied by the Austro-German troops in Russian Poland and Galicia. If my readers wish to derive any benefit from my really arduous researches they will have to get down their maps and follow thereon, or else I doubt their obtaining much benefit.

Commencing at the north just over the border of East Prussia, in Russian Poland, there is a place called Szaki, a little south of the Niemen River and about thirty miles to the west of Kovno. Thence the line runs almost directly south, now on one side and now on the other to Suwalki, also in Russian Poland, thence southwest to Lyck in eastern Prussia. Thence to Lodwitsch not far from Warsaw, again in Russian Poland, to Konskie and Kielge, both in Poland, to Cracow in Galicia. The Russian line follows the same general direction, except that on the Galician end it does not run to Cracow, but to Tarnow, some fifty miles to the east. At this last place, Tarnow, heavy fighting is now going on between the Austrian and Russian troops, with up to the present time indecisive results.

Further to the east from Tarnow is the fortress of Przemysl, which is occupied by an Austrian force and which the Russians have been besieging for nearly three weeks, and which still (October 9) holds out. The Russians are also said to have entered Hungary through the Carpathian mountain passes, and to be establishing themselves in that kingdom.

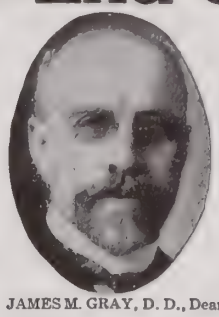
There have been such conflicting reports concerning the fighting along the east Prussian border and in Russian Poland, that it is really hard to form a definite idea as to what has really happened there.

However, we may look for a great battle along this line within the next week or so, and this battle will be one of the most important of the war, both in itself and in its influence on the general situation.

Incomplete news has been received of the wrecking of a Red Cross train near Marne, France, through faulty signals, many wounded soldiers on their way to the hospital losing their lives, according to the despatch.

A cardboard full-size reproduction of the German 13C (164-inch) siege gun, bearing names and dates of battles in Belgium—Liège, Namur, etc.—is being sold in Berlin as a war novelty; it is called "Germany's War Surprise."

Are We Facing The End of The World?



JAMES M. GRAY, D. D., Dean

Is the present European struggle the Battle of Armageddon mentioned in the Book of Revelation? What relation does it bear to the end of the age or to the second coming of Christ? These questions which have been stirring the minds of the people since the outbreak of the war are clearly answered in a recent lecture entitled

The Battle of Armageddon

By DR. JAMES M. GRAY, Dean of The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

Ever since Theodore Roosevelt figuratively spoke of the 1912 Progressive Party Campaign as "The Battle of Armageddon" considerable interest has been aroused regarding the subject in its true sense as a statement of Biblical origin which is to have its fulfillment on earth. Dr. Gray's lecture has been printed in pamphlet form and will be mailed for a short time only with a three month's subscription to the Christian Workers Magazine for 25 cents. Dr. James M. Gray is editor of The Christian Workers Magazine. It contains his notes on current events in the light of revelation and notes on Bible study. Also other contributions from Christian leaders. Sunday school lesson notes and missionary notes. Single copy 10c.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

MRS. R. E. W. acknowledges answer to prayer for the restoration of her reason. Her recovery was regarded as a miracle by her friends. Mrs. M. C. writes from Wilmington, Del.: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in the saving of my dear son's sight, for whom I wrote, asking the prayers of the League." A Reader of Cincinnati, O., writes: "I have received a very phenomenal answer to prayer for a loved one who had become addicted to the drink habit." Hopeful Mother writes from Connecticut: "A short time ago I requested your prayers for my dear son whose health was very much impaired, partly from the drink habit. I now wish to thank the dear Lord and the Christian friends who have helped me through my trouble. I can see a great improvement." Mr. and Mrs. A. H. K. write from Long Beach, Cal.: "God has answered our prayers and healed our little boy, and we are so thankful." C. M., of Jersey City, N. J., writes: "Prayers requested for a position lost have been marvelously answered."

A Reader of Bloomington, Ind., writes: "With a grateful heart I write to say that God has heard and answered my prayer. My daughter and her husband are living together again and are happy, and their little daughter is well and strong." E. and A. A. write from Brookline, Mo.: "We wish to make grateful acknowledgment for the answer to our prayer to dispose of some property." E. N. F., of Tiffin, O., writes: "I want to testify to an answer to my prayer for my little girl. She is stronger and doing well in school; also for myself. I was so nervous I could hardly sleep at night, but now I am very much better." A CHRISTIAN HERALD Reader, of Lima, Texas, writes: "I thank God for answered prayer. My daughter has been helped to accomplish the task she had undertaken." "A Grateful Girl" writes: "I feel as if I want to tell the world how good God has been to me and answered my prayers. I was in Europe in all the turmoil and I went to him in prayer and asked him to bring me safely home, which he did, without any hardships at all. Then the young man I am engaged to was ill and I asked God to make him well, and he is now fully restored to health."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from

F. M. W., Karnak, Ill., for mother's health; A. H., Cook, Neb.; Mrs. A. E. M. R., Shoreham, N. Y., for having been brought safely through an operation; E. F. C., Townsend Harbor, Man., for physical and moral strength; CHRISTIAN HERALD Reader, Coffey, Mo., for help in time of storm, and many blessings; O. Y., Baltimore, Md., for many direct and wonderful answers to prayer; A Young Reader, Osseo, Wis.; K. M. W., Rexmont, Pa., for help with lessons; D. W. D., Woodhaven, L. I.; Mr. and Mrs. M. P., Dodge, Iowa.

Rev. Eli Austin, prison missionary at Mason City, Ia., writes a most interesting letter, telling of his work. On a recent Sunday morning a number of prisoners, among them several hardened criminals, came forward and asked, with tears, for prayer. Mr. Austin asks the members of the Prayer League to unite in prayer for these men. C. B. F. asks prayer that his wife's life may be spared; V. H., for special help for herself and aged sister.

E. L. C. suggests and requests prayer for a world-wide revival; Mrs. J. W. R., for nation-wide prohibition; M. F. M., for State-wide prohibition in Ohio; Mrs. M. P., for the Boston campaign in the cause of national prohibition; J. S., for a revival in a church at York, N. Y., and that a minister may be sent; Mrs. A. J. C., for a baptism of the Holy Spirit upon the church at Smithfield, Va.; M. J. L., for a revival in the town of Hobbs, Ind.; Mrs. J. W. R., for a revival in Beaverville, N. Y.; N. C. M., for a great revival in the community of South Euclid, Ohio; W. F. R., for God's help in the Union Sunday school at Mackford, Wis.; Mrs. F. S., that her husband (who feels the call to preach) may receive the place of work for which he hopes; Mr. and Mrs. W. L. T., for spiritual blessing and health and strength for the work they are soon to take up in the far West.

W. L. R. asks prayer that her son's mind may be restored; A Reader, Mansfield, Ohio, her husband's; Mrs. A. E. C., that her daughter's mind may be strengthened; Mrs. L. H. B., that her granddaughter's mind be restored; E. R. I., that a loved one's mind may be strengthened; Miss A. V. G., that a young woman's mind may be restored; Mrs. W. E. P., that a dear one's mind may be restored; Mrs. C. K. L., Mrs. P. A. L., Miss L. M., for mental restoration. L. L. asks prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. H. A. K., that husband's sight may be restored; C. C. E., mother's; E. M., nephew's; J. S., a minister's; J. D. M. and Mrs. A. E. H., that sight may be strengthened; A. M. S., that granddaughter's sight may be strengthened; T. N., for healing of eye strain. E. A. and A. A., Mrs. J., Mrs. M. C. S., C. C. E., M. E. R., Mrs. A. J. G., A Subscriber, Miss K. V., Mrs. E. J. C. T., M. H., and D. E. B. ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or friends.

M. A. A., M. J. A., M. S., Mrs. M. C., O. S., and a Hopeful Mother, ask prayer that their sons may be saved from the drink habit; Mrs. M. P., D. C. P., A Poor Woman, A Constant Reader, their husbands; Mrs. S. L. R., her grandson; E. P. N., M. A. H. S., "Maxine," and Mrs. A. J. G., other relatives and friends. Mrs. S. A. WOMEN AND CHILDREN FIRST

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

THERE are hundreds, no, thousands, of unwritten laws in the world, but perhaps the one most often quoted, most thoroughly understood, is the old law of the sea. For when trouble comes, and the ship is sinking, and the ocean stretches out a horribly large waste of water meeting a horribly blank sky, and when the boats are lowered away the cry always comes, "Women and children first!" And men are prepared to enforce the law with their very lives; while men who push aside the weaker ones to save themselves are branded cowards and very often shot like mad dogs.

Women and children first! The words ring with a great feeling of bravery, with a spirit of chivalry that has long been dead in this work-a-day world of ours. And yet, when I hear the words now I cannot help thinking of a different interpretation. For over in the blood-drenched countries of Europe the women and children are, indeed first—the first to suffer!

When I was very young, war was always a most interesting topic of conversation with me. I pictured dapper, suave, be-moustached young men going forth on prancing chargers to do battle, while satin-gowned women leaned from high, romantic-looking balconies and threw roses or handkerchiefs to them. I dreamed of this kind of war for years with the vision hugged furiously to my little Peter Pan heart, but as I grew older the pictures faded and grimmer ones took their places. Still no imagined picture, however grim, came near to some of the photographs that I have seen lately—some of the little, commonplace tragedies of every-day war life.

The heroes are not be-ribboned gallants, for most of them are peasants, sad-eyed folk, who are wishing that they could plow their fields, and harvest their crops; sacrifices that kings are offering to the war god to whom they pray. And the women—the women in the pictures! They are haggard-faced, tear-stained women, with babies in their arms and babies clasping to their skirts. Young-old, wistful, terrified women, with wondering souls and breaking hearts!

Do you know Charles Kingsley's poem that says, "For men must work and women must weep!"?

That, too, is a poem of the sea that seems to fit into the present situation. For the men of all the old world are going out to work, terrible, blood-red work, while the women are staying home, brushing the empty hearths, hearing the heavy guns thunder-like in the distance, and weeping.

It is not a very hard thing in these troubled times, to be named a hero. Men under the stress of war do things that they would shudder at in peaceful days, say things they would never dream of in ordinary circumstances. A man saves his country's flag, warns his general of an ambush, and drags his wounded comrade to safety, quite as a matter of course. I wonder if I am being unfair when I say that he does a good many of his bravest things because there is no time to think over the consequences.

But the woman—the woman waiting at home! She has nothing to do but think of a thousand things. Of the bullets that are whistling past her husband's head, of the drum that is calling him to action, of the gaping scarlet wound that a sabre cut can make. She is thinking, not of the country's need, but of the children who follow her with troubled eyes, asking why there is nothing to eat.

Somehow, when I picture war as a personality, I always see him attended by two figures, a lean skeleton in a black cowl, with a scythe in his hand, and a bent, emaciated woman's form, with hollow eyes and sunken cheeks. One is called Death and the other is called Famine. It is Death who walks by the side of the men-folk, hewing them down with merciful speed, but it is Famine who creeps, stealthily, like a gray shadow, through the loosely swinging cottage door. And the death that comes with Famine is neither swift nor merciful. It is a death that stands ever at your elbow, insistent; a death that follows always at your heels, a death that peers down on you, furtively, as you sleep.

Death should, to the true followers of God, be a wonderful thing; a reward that comes to the brave and good after a beautiful life. But a death that takes women in their prime, and tiny, innocent children at the very threshold of the world, takes them for the want of a bite to eat, and a bit of fire to keep away the chill, and a rag to wear, could not be called beautiful by anyone.

Women of America, you who have your husbands working by your sides, and your children playing rosy-cheeked and plump within calling distance, think of the dreary homes across the sea! You who have plenty of food, and clothes that are pretty, and fire to keep you warm, think of those other women who are sitting by a cold hearth, with their husbands dead and their children dying; sitting with weary eyes, and praying hearts, and oh! God—empty hands!

"For men must work and women must weep—"

Well, the men are at work, heavily, horribly at work, killing other men; and the women are weeping with frenzied sobs, or low, heart-broken murmurs; and as I read the papers, and look at the pictures that are circulating through our land, it seems to me that I can hear their weeping across the ocean that stretches between us.

We who have homes that are happy and love-filled,
We who have plenty to eat and to drink,
We who have husbands, and children and brothers,
Safe at our sides—of the other ones think!
Think of the homes that have fallen in ashes,
Think of the voices no more raised in song,
Think of the little ones helplessly starving,
Praying for some one to help them along!

FOUND OUT

A Trained Nurse Discovered Its Effect.

No one is in better position to know the value of food and drink than a trained nurse.

Speaking of coffee a nurse in Pa. writes: "I used to drink strong coffee myself, and suffered greatly from headaches and indigestion.

"While on a visit to my brothers I had a good chance to try Postum, for they drank it altogether in place of coffee. After using Postum two weeks I found I was much benefited and finally my headaches disappeared and also the indigestion.

"Naturally I have since used Postum among my patients, and have noticed a marked benefit where coffee has been left off and Postum used.

"I observe a curious fact about Postum when used by mothers. It greatly helps the flow of milk in cases where coffee is inclined to dry it up, and where tea causes nervousness.

"I find trouble in getting servants to make Postum properly. But when it is prepared according to directions on package and served hot with cream, it is certainly a delicious beverage."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Questions and Answers

ader, N. Y. Does a "forgiving spirit" mean that the one wronged should be in all things the same to the one who did the wrong while still unrepentant, as he would be after forgiveness had been asked, or does it mean simply to be ready to be the same to him when he does ask forgiveness?

A "forgiving spirit" means, first and last, a ing spirit. While we cannot prevent a feeling deep grief where we ourselves are wronged, e greater grief ought to be for the one who s done wrong. If a son should wrong his other she feels more sorry for the boy who s done wrong than for herself who suffers e wrong. The same ought to be true of hus- nd and wife, brother and sister, neighbor and ighbor. There is love and forgiveness in the art the moment the wrong is done. In some spects, however, it is quite impossible to ve the same feeling toward the wrong-doer fore forgiveness is asked. Our affection for n, before the wrong, was largely based on at we believed him to be; when we find at he is not the person we thought him be, our feelings of delight in his association d admiration for him necessarily undergo a ange. Our great desire must be to bring him ck to the purity which he has lost. And he nself cannot regain that lost purity till he s confessed his wrong and asked forgiveness. , while, for our own sake, we freely forgive, d continue to feel and act kindly, yet for his n sake we must seek to lead him to a recog- ion and acknowledgment of his wrong. All ese considerations will unavoidably affect the tails of our conduct. While every act must kind, we must not allow the wrong-doer to ink that we are insensible of the fact that he s done wrong, but we must show him that are earnestly desiring his repentance and storation.

ere is a question which we should like to have a large number of our readers answer. It is asked by Mrs. F. F., of Ottawa, Ill.: "What are the twelve most beautiful or helpful chapters in the Bible?"

We shall state our own choice now, and er print the opinion of others who may write. is hardly to be expected that any two Bible ers would give precisely the same list. It ally comes to be a matter of "favorite chap- s." But the favorite chapters will be those ich have helped us most, or seem to us most autiful. Here is the vote of one of the edi- rs of the Mail-Bag: Isa. 55; John 15; I Cor. ; Rom. 6; Gal. 3; Eph. 3; Col. 3; Isa. 43; a. 54; Ps. 91; Heb. 10; I John 3.

H. R., Plymouth, Mich. 1. Mark 13: 31, Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my ords shall not pass away," is the strongest ssible expression of the divine authority by ich Jesus spoke; not as Moses or Paul or the ophets said of their own inspiration, but as ity alone could speak, for such language ould be out of place on merely human lips. e same explanation applies to Matt. 24: 35. Eccles. 1: 4 is figurative language, showing at while the earth remains the same from e to age, the generations of man are ever anging. The words "forever" are comparative, not absolute. (See Ps. 102: 25, 26.) In rious places in the Scriptures "forever" is ed in the sense of "age-lasting" or "age- during"—a future of unmeasured length hose limitations we do not know. In Ps. 4: 5, commentators hold that the expression ed does not deny the earth's motion, but the ssibility of its being disturbed from the place the universe which God has assigned it.

I. B. S., of Estrella, Calif., makes a very good beginning at answering his own question: What is the teaching of the Scriptures regarding the duty to bear arms? especially as to helping in a war which is believed to be neither righteous nor necessary?

He writes: "Is Christ's rule: 'Resist not evil if a man smite thee on the cheek,' etc., applicable to nations as well as individuals? If t, why not? If Christ's rule were to be opted by Christian nations, most wars among hristians might be avoided, it seems, since any start in a silly sensitiveness as to national insults. Nations surely ought to bear d forbear as much as individuals, since their illure to do so entails such vast disaster. ould any real harm ensue if another nation thheld a right regard for the flag or insulted in any other way? In such case were it t: simply to ask an apology, and in case of fusal, to take the matter to a court of arbiation or to mediators, and if the nation at ult should not submit to mediation, to sever plomatic relations, without thought of war? This would be according to Christ's command, I think: 'If thy brother trespass against thee, first tell him his fault,' etc."

D. D. D., Geneva, Fla., and H. H., Bridgeport, Conn. There are two kinds of evil, physical and moral. The passage in Isa. 45: 7 is shown by the context to relate to physical evil. Where moral evil exists in the minds of wicked men and is shown in their acts, their plots, their imaginings and their wicked schemes, physical evil comes as an outcome of the moral evil itself, the inevitable result of the violation of divine law. The present war is an illustration. It had its inception in the evil hearts of men, and their wicked schemes, being in opposition to the moral government of God—which is always beneficent—brought about world-wide disturbance. The rulers of Europe knew what was certain to follow their violation of Christian principles; but nothing could stop them from carrying out their own selfish plans. The result which followed cannot be attributed to the Almighty, as had they followed the dictates of Christianity, there would have been no war.

L. A. S., Crawford, Pa. The Jews in Scripture times did not rise to any true or profound conception of the brotherhood of nations. They did not regard the Gentiles as brethren, and held that they would be destroyed at the Messiah's coming, whereas the Bible teaches that all were to be brought into "one fold under one shepherd." Indeed, the main part of New Testament history deals with the breaking down of the barrier between Jew and Gentile (Eph. 2: 14). In Mal. 1: 14, Isa. 60: 3, and other passages the spread of the light among the Gentiles is clearly foreshadowed. The passage in Rom. 11: 25 ("the fulness of the Gentiles") is interpreted as meaning "until the Gentiles have had their full time of the visible church all to themselves, while the Jews are out, as the Jews themselves had until the Gentiles were brought in." Then, when that time arrives, all the spiritual Israel (Jew and Gentile alike) shall be saved.

E. R. G., Seattle, Wash. 1. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus was designed to show how humble piety is rewarded with ultimate bliss in the other world, while selfish affluence is condemned. There is a tradition that the two individuals named in the parable were actual persons: Dives, which means rich, being Dobruk, while Lazarus was a well-known mendicant of Jerusalem, who lived in the most abject poverty, but was of saintly character. 2. The passage in Mark 9: 43, 44 and subsequent verses was dealt with in a recent issue of the Mail-Bag. 3. Isa. 66: 24 is interpreted as referring to the judgments that were to fall on those slain in the last great battle near Jerusalem, which judgments were a type of the final destruction of all sinners. "Their worm shall not die neither shall their fire be quenched" is a figure drawn from bodies left unburied in the refuse pits in the valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem, where a constant fire was kept up to consume the offal thrown there. From the name of this valley we have the word "Gehenna," which is frequently applied to the unquenchable fire of the nether world.

J. L. C., Savoy, Texas. 1. The "beasts" mentioned in Rev. 4: 6-9 are believed by commentators to be living creatures "symbolic of the carnal man who, by rebellion, loses his true glory and dominion over the lower creatures and is degraded to the level of the beast." This is one of the many obscure passages in the Apocalypse. There have been various fanciful interpretations, some of them identifying the "beasts" with the four evangelists and others, but all are alike conjectural. 2. The "wheels" mentioned several times in Ezekiel's prophecy have been interpreted as typifying the gigantic energy "of the complicated revolutions of God's providence, bringing about his purposes with unerring certainty."

L. E. B., Wellsville, N. Y. Canaan was the promised inheritance of the Israelites. Much has been written concerning the sanguinary history of the conquest. Some authorities have claimed that the Israelites had the right to the land as the common pasture of their herdsmen, which was held in undisturbed possession from the time of Abraham until the departure of Jacob into Egypt; "that this claim had never been relinquished and that therefore the Israelites only took possession of that which belonged to them." Those were rude days, and the character of the warfare, which was one of practical extermination, has been much criticized. All we know of the matter now is what we have in the Bible and in Josephus, the Jewish historian, who describes the conquest in books five and six of The Antiquities.

C. H. D., Baltimore, Md. The passage in Rev. 13: 18 has been the subject of much comment. It deals with the number of the beast. Many students of prophecy have attempted to explain it, but none satisfactorily. Some have held it to be the name Lateinos (Rome); others believe it refers to Balaam, a type of the false prophet. We have never heard of any solution pointing to Napoleon Bonaparte.

Does Your Figure Please You?

Your dressmaker can never make a gown look well on you unless you have a good figure and unless you carry it well

I want to make you realize that your figure and health are almost entirely in your own hands, and that by following my simple, hygienic directions in the privacy of your own room that your whole being vibrates health. I have helped 65,000 of the most refined, intellectual women of America to regain health and good figures; and have taught them how to keep well. Why not you? You are busy, but you can devote a few minutes a day, in the privacy of your own room, to following scientific, hygienic principles of health prescribed to your particular needs.

You Can Be So Well

I have reduced the weight of over 32,000 women and increased the weight of as many more. In my work for reduction or building the body I strengthen every vital function so that you are full of life and energy.

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent, and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense. Fully one-third of my pupils are sent to me by those who have worked with me.

I wish you could stand with me at my window for a few minutes and, as the women pass, realize with me how many need better figures, better health. They could have them too, with just a little daily effort which is easy—not as hard as what they are enduring.

The best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils—the medical magazines advertise my work. Some one in your town knows me. Ask your friends about my work. I am at my desk daily from 8 to 5.

No Drugs—No Medicines

I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that instead of medicine I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercises for nerves and muscles controlling them, bringing a good circulation of warm blood to them, which I purify by teaching correct breathing. I relieve such ailments as

Indigestion	Sleeplessness	Catarrh	Suffering in
Constipation	Nervousness	Headaches	Pregnancy
Anaemia	Torpid Liver	Weakness	Rheumatism

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement for greater culture, refinement and beauty in woman. Sit down and write me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it. I have had a wonderful experience and I should like to tell you about it.

Questions and Answers

M. J. M., Wagner, Ariz. I feel as if I would give my very life if I could know in the depths of my heart that I am a child of the King, and could love him as he loves me. I at one time believed I was a Christian, but of late I seem to have lost all confidence in myself and in my will power. I feel so discouraged and blue at times; it seems as if I just can't control my temper and make myself love the Lord. At the time I was converted I was happy, and for some time afterward, but now I doubt my conversion.

"It is darkest just before dawn." There are messages in your letter which indicate that your soul is ripe for a great and abiding blessing. "I seem to have lost all confidence in myself and in my will power." That is an excellent symptom. Every sould must reach that place of complete distrust of self before it is really ready to receive God's abounding and sustaining grace. You add: "I can't control my temper and make myself love the Lord." Certainly not. But God can do these things that you cannot do. It was when we were "without strength" that Christ died for the ungodly. (Rom. 5: 6.) "What the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, God [did] sending his own Son." (Rom. 8: 3.) Read again the great passage from Ezekiel, which has been quoted a number of times recently in the Mail-Bag: Ezek. 36: 25-27. It is when we lose all confidence in our own spirit that he will put his Spirit within us and "cause" us to walk in his statutes. Your trouble is stated definitely in one word at the end of the sentences quoted from your letter: "I doubt my conversion." Don't do that. You say you were happy. There is a real fact. It was Christ who made you happy by forgiving your sins. That is a fact just as real. You speak later in your letter of something that you fear was a sin, but if that was before your conversion it is included in the sins that were completely forgiven then. Do not let the tempter bring it up and worry you about it now. If there have been sins since that time they can be made right in the same way—confession, restitution (where restitution is possible), repentance and faith. Now let us go back to the beginning of your letter. You say you would give your very life if these desires could be realized. There is no need for you to do that, because Jesus has already done it, and for the very same purpose—that you might be blessed. He loves you just as much today as in the day that he died for you. Begin again to trust his love and his power, and you will find them sufficient now, to cleanse and warm and strengthen your soul. Then begin quickly to try to help some one else, passing on the blessing you have received, and helping in every possible way all whom your life can touch.

G. D. W., Denver, Col. Please explain I Cor. 15: 2.

The central point of Paul's teaching was the reality of the atonement and the resurrection. Holding this firmly, and not superficially or as being nonessential, he believed it would be impossible for the Corinthian Christians to misapprehend its importance. At the time in which Paul wrote, it is believed that there was a short summary of articles of faith in existence, profession of which was required of candidates for baptism. In the passage in question, he is emphasizing the importance of "holding fast" and keeping constantly in memory that essential fact. A preferable translation of the verse is: "By which ye are saved if ye hold fast (in memory and personal appropriation) unless (which is to be regarded as impossible) your faith is vain." They should believe firmly in the atonement and resurrection and not hold it merely as a mental detail. Read verses 12 to 19, and further emphasize the same thought and how vital an important it is to the Christian concept.

Pennsylvania Reader. Ever since I learned of the plea of our nation's people for peace in those war-torn countries, the thought has been persistently impressed upon me, would it be the only acceptable prayer be: "Lord, we implore thee that thy will shall be done in regard to this war"? How do we know but what it is our most gracious Lord's sovereign will that this war shall be just as it has been, and even continue more and more? So really, do we not sin in praying for the war to cease at once?

Some things we have such positive information about as to God's will that we would be mocking him and denying his revelation if we qualified our petition by saying: "If it be thy will." We know that God hates war. One of the clearest prophecies of Scripture is that the time will come when it shall cease. The first announcement and promise when the Messiah came was "Peace." We know that every single problem which nations have to settle could be settled by peaceful and reasonable arbitration. It is our duty to pray that God will turn the minds of those who are forcing the present war to a hatred and horror of the anguish they are causing and to a desire and determination to find a peaceful settlement of their differences. But we may also pray that if the war is not stopped at once God will overrule the wrath of man and the furies of the battlefields so that his work in the world may go on in the best possible way when the woe of the war has passed.

J. B., Daytona, Ohio. Belgium has so often been the scene of wars that it was long ago denominated "the cockpit of Europe." Antwerp's foundation dates back to Viking days. Its first siege was in 851 A.D., when it fell before the invading Northmen, and was almost destroyed by fire. In 1500 it had a population of 200,000, and began its career of maritime and commercial prosperity. It has been captured and recaptured many times, looted by troops and mobs, and its churches desecrated. In the time of Alva, it was pillaged, and many of its inhabitants slain. During the period known as the "Spanish Fury," it was despoiled of everything of value, and thousands of its citizens were killed. This was in 1576. Again in 1585, it was besieged by Parma, and captured. Up to 1832 it has gone through no less than nine sieges! Few if any great cities can look back to a history so replete with bloodshed.

Mildred M. T., Neligh, Neb. Before the days of written or recorded history, notable events were memorized by minstrels and others who made it a special calling. They sang the songs of ancient deeds of prowess and conquest, of the founding of states, etc. As civilization advanced and the art began to flourish, hieroglyphics (picture-writing) and other forms were employed to commemorate past events, even though these had happened long ages before. We are now finding in the excavations of long-buried cities records that refer to the Flood and subsequent happenings, all these having originally been preserved orally and handed down from age to age in that form until they could be inscribed in some enduring fashion. More than likely the ancients had their historical textbooks in the forms of inscribed tablets or papyrus leaves. Many of the Babylonian tablets which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been offering to its readers contain records of events that go back to the very beginning of civilized history.

E. C. A., LaGrange, Ill. 1. We believe the Sessions family returned from the Congo, one of the members having died while there. 2. We have heard nothing regarding Professor Dimbleby, the prophetic writer, in late years.

B. O., Racine, Wis. 1. There are several very instructive books published on Revelation, from which you could learn the various views of those who have studied the subject extensively. Among them are those written by Knappenberger, of Syracuse, N. Y., and The Great Demonstration, published by the Standard Publishing Company, Cincinnati, Ohio. What you require is something more comprehensive than the limitations of the Mail-Bag allow. 2. The moving-picture business has come to stay, and it is being made a mighty force for instruction. There are some shows that are cheap and vulgar, but the great majority are good, and they put within the reach of the multitude an opportunity for helpful and instructive amusement.

Mrs. S. H. K., Volant, Pa. 1. The passage to which you refer is probably Amos, 8th chapter, although not precisely in the language you quote. See also Jer. 48: 32. 2. There is nothing in the best encyclopedias at our disposal which tells of the length of the wall surrounding Jericho.

Mrs. N. R., Washington, Me. Rev. John Flavel was a distinguished non-conformist divine, born in England in 1627. He settled at Dartmouth in 1665, where he had a large field and did excellent work. He was ejected from his mission for non-conformity, but preached and ministered to a very large parish, nevertheless. He lived in a period when persecution was bitter against non-conformists and suffered for his convictions on several occasions. He died in 1691, leaving behind him a name greatly beloved. His writings were published in London in 1820.

"THE SILENT SUFFERERS"

BY ELEANOR DUNCAN WOOD

IN THE sunny Old-World countries, the scene of the New World's play,
Where Beauty and Mirth abounded, stalk Famine and Death today.
There are charred and crumbling ruins where the cot and the castle stood,
And who shall delve in the furrows when the furrows are drenched in blood?

Gone are the fathers and husbands, pawns in War's ruthless game.
Gone the sons and the lovers; ah, sweet Christ, whose the blame?
Only the women, useless for strife or stratagem,
And the babes who cling to their garments are left. And what of them?

Smoke from a hundred battles sullies the autumn skies.
Groans of the maimed and starving, stench of the dead arise.
All the world in the conflict, no nation's heart to rue,
Or hand to help. O my brothers, shall America not stand true?

Not theirs the blame transcendent, theirs but the 'whelming loss.
Touch our hearts with thy pity, O Lord Christ on thy cross!
Crazed, and helpless, and hopeless. Bodies and hearts like ours.
Shall we not bend to their service all of our God-lent powers?

Give with the heart of the prairie wind, generous faring forth!
Give with the warmth of the Southland, give with the strength of the North!
Freedom and Peace and Plenty grace our land's diadem.
Look in your children's faces, and give as you would to them.

J. H. Hess, Beaver Falls, Pa. The reason why Abram did not divide the birds (see Gen. 15) was that such a course would have been in opposition to the Mosaic law. (See Lev. 1: 15-17.) It may not have been in the written law in Abram's time, but yet was apparently understood, and was afterwards emphasized in explicit language, which you may read in the 17th verse of the first chapter of Leviticus.

W. B. G., Jr., writes, referring to a recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on Professor Lucius Hoskins Miller and his theological teaching at Princeton. He says: "Princeton Theological Seminary is not responsible in any way. Professor Miller is not and has not ever been connected with it in any manner, either as teacher or pupil. It is Princeton University in which he is assistant professor of Biblical instruction. Princeton University, though endowed largely with the money of Presbyterians, and throughout her history in sympathy with evangelical religion, is in no sense an ecclesiastical institution."

Some geologists and scientists assert that the earth is over 500,000,000 years old, judging by the different geological periods, but there can be no definite contention on the subject. It is claimed that since the formation of the primitive soils at least 21,000,000 years must have elapsed—6,700,000 for the primordial formations; 6,400,000 for the primary age; 2,300,000 for the secondary age and 460,000 for the tertiary, and that man appeared 100,000 years ago.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE three important events of the week past, the taking of Antwerp, the sinking of the Russian cruiser Pellada in the Baltic Sea and the British cruiser Hawke in the North Sea, confirm the two important lessons of this war in a military sense, to which attention has been several times called in these columns. The first of these lessons is that the day of the battleship is past, in view of the impossibility of defending it against a joint attack of submarines and some form of aircraft; and the second is that the day of the elaborate land fortification is also past, as a result of the enormous advance in the penetrative power of artillery.

Since the beginning of the war, only ten weeks ago, the Amphion, Hawke, Pathfinder, Cressy, Hogue, Aboukir, and the Pellada have all been destroyed by submarines acting in co-operation with aircraft, nearly one vessel a week. A long war at this rate of progress would easily exhaust the efficient units of the strongest fleet in the world. As a corollary to the main theorem, it may also be said that a strict blockade of any extensive line of sea coast has become an impossibility.

The effect of this passing of the battleship will be enormous. Considered as applied to naval construction alone, the saving will be very great. Hereafter the coasts of the United States can be absolutely defended by three to four hundred submarines with an equal number of aircraft, supported by the comparatively simple, large earthwork fortifications which will be most efficient against the new artillery, because less resistant.

The cost of five battleships would cover the entire cost of the submarine and aerial fleet.

Considered as regards human life it would result in risking only at most a few hundred men instead of the many thousands which a battleship fleet now carries.

Of the two vessels sunk this week, the Pellada was a protected cruiser of 7,887 tons displacement, with a protection belt of eight-inch armor, launched in 1907, and carrying four ten-inch and eight six-inch guns. Her speed was twenty-one knots, and she carried a crew of about 550. Of the crew very few were saved. Russia has such a small navy that the loss of even a single unit is of importance to her. The Hawke was a little smaller, 7,350 tons, and in construction one of the Edgar class. Of her crew of 500 but fifty were saved.

Besides these events little occurred on the water. Great efforts are being made to catch and destroy the German cruiser Emden, whose record as a commerce destroyer is only excelled by the Alabama, the confederate cruiser in our Civil War. So far, the chase has been unsuccessful as far as the Emden herself is concerned, but her two attendant vessels have been overtaken and destroyed off the coast of Sumatra by a British auxiliary cruiser.

The sinking of the Hawke so comparatively soon after the destruction of the Cressy, Aboukir and Hogue by the same means, may so anger the British public as to force the admiralty to attempt to force Kiel or Wilhelmshaven, but for the reasons which have heretofore been given in these columns it is to be hoped this will not be attempted.

THE CATHEDRAL AT ANTWERP

Few details reach us of the siege of Germany's East Asian colony of Kiauchau. There has been some loss of life, but nothing definite appears to have been yet achieved. The Japanese are going about the matter in their usual methodical fashion, leaving nothing to chance. The non-combatants, including our consul there, were by agreement between the Germans and the Japanese allowed to leave the town, and now the lines have been drawn tightly, not to be loosened till the surrender.

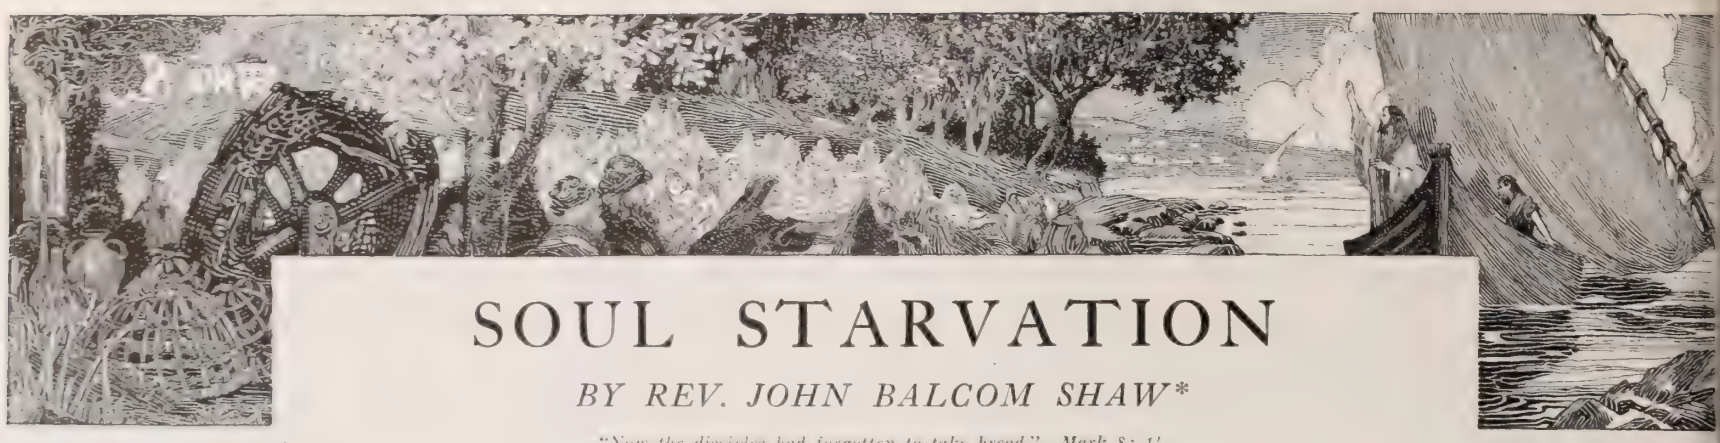
It is greatly to be hoped that the town itself will not greatly suffer during the bombardment now imminent. Money has not been stinted in its development, with the result that it is the best built and prettiest town in the East, according to Anglo-Saxon ideas. It has in the past been the favorite watering place for all the whites in the East, and in many respects resembles one of our own favorite seaside towns. This feature will, of course, disappear with Japanese occupation.

Rather sensational tidings came to hand from South Africa during the week. One Colonel Maritz, a Boer, who gained his title in the recent war with England, and who had accepted a command in the forces which General Botha is engaged in raising for the purpose of attacking German Southwest Africa, deserted to the enemy with some thousand men.

The very delicate situation in South Africa caused considerable apprehension that this example might be followed by others for a day or two. Nothing of the kind, however, happened, as far as we are advised, and a late cable informed us that the deserters had been attacked and defeated with considerable loss by a command of loyal Boers, seventy of the insurgents being taken prisoners. These prisoners will, of course, be shot as traitors.

Before we discuss the actual news from the several battle lines, it may be of interest to refer briefly to the physical condition of the troops of the various combatants. Both the Germans and English have deemed it necessary to send medical experts to the front to view the condition of the troops there and to take such measures concerning the physical health of the men as may, in view of the conditions, seem necessary to these experts. This action has been necessitated by the apparent great prevalence of disease among the troops in the trenches as a result of their long-continued exposure to the elements, which for nearly six weeks now have been very inclement.

Among the Germans that dread disease typhus is said to have made its appearance, and it is also stated that there is much pneumonia and dysentery. These troops have lived so long in wet clothes, in trenches more or less filled with water, and have been of necessity more or less poorly fed, that it is a great wonder an epidemic has not made its appearance before now.



SOUL STARVATION

*BY REV. JOHN BALCOM SHAW

"Now the disciples had forgotten to take bread." Mark 8: 14

IT WAS a complete lapse of memory, unfortunately. They had forgotten both kinds of bread. Their neglect to take the first kind, material bread, gave them exclusive concern. They construed it as the reason for the Master's warning: "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees." Poor, soul-blinded men and women! As if Jesus were cautioning them against the yeast which the cooks of the Pharisees used in baking! Though they realized it not, they had forgotten the other kind, too—spiritual bread—and that was the real matter for concern with Jesus, and the reason for his special word of warning.

How alike human nature is in all ages! Our physical derelictions we so frequently lament, while our spiritual neglects go by default and are not so much as noted. Let us fail to provide against a day's temporal needs, and we heap no limit of blame upon ourselves; but let the soul's demands be neglected and we go on unconscious of the failure, much less concerned about it.

How often all of us forget to take spiritual nourishment with us! We were so rushed the other morning that we did not stop to have family prayers, and our spiritual life grew faint and lost its vigor before the day was fairly started, down at the office. The whole Sunday went by without our getting a single meal at the Lord's table, and famishing souls we carried about with us the rest of the week. Some of us, for that matter, do not get a good square meal of Bible bread more than once or twice a year, if we do that often. Soul starvation is the cause that will account for most of the weaklings now in the church. It is like unto the case of "water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink." There is bread, plenty of bread; a Bible, several of them, in every home; exceeding great and precious promises upon every page of the Word of God; bread enough and to spare on every shelf of the Bible larder, and we perish with hunger; or, if we eat anything, we confine ourselves to the sweetmeats and desserts—lesson helps, devotional calendars or booklets, the religious newspapers, or the religious column in the Sunday morning paper. Is it any wonder that so many Christians have an abnormal appetite, caring little for the substantial and nutritious, and in consequence suffering from spiritual dyspepsia?

Spiritual Adulterants

HENRY WARD BEECHER once described to his Brooklyn congregation his boyhood appetite for bread. He must have a slice before breakfast and way around the loaf. It was bread at breakfast and dinner and supper, and several slices between meals, and a big slice to go to bed on; and he added, "What if it had been cake instead of bread? Where had been my health and what strength would I have had for the work of life? And yet you treat the Bread of Life as if it were cake. You put it away in the cupboard and never use it except on special occasions. You cut it into small pieces and serve it sparingly, instead of keeping it always at hand and eating it frequently and freely."

Yes, and let me add, we do something worse than that. We substitute cake for bread. It isn't that we serve the bread stingily, but that we serve cake instead of bread, or a kind of predigested food—I don't know how else to describe it—which isn't the Bible, but something about the Bible, or something from the Bible, adulterated, disguised and served up in daintily prepared dishes to catch the appetite.

And what is the result? We are rearing a generation of puny, lean, sickly Christians, and some churches look more like sanitariums and diet kitchens than anything else.

There could be no better advice than that which Bengel gave to the people of his time: "Apply thyself to the Scriptures; apply the Scriptures to thyself"; or Alexander White's counsel: "Take a promise the first thing every morning and stand out upon it"; or that of Samuel Johnson: "Young man, attend to the voice of one who has attained a certain degree of fame and who will shortly appear before his Maker. Read the Bible every day of your life."

"That Which Is Not Bread"

BUT we are now at the close of the season when this forgetfulness is most common. Summer travelers, vacationers, do not usually forget to take their best clothes, or sufficient money, if they have it, or a good stock of new novels, or the current issues of the magazines to read on the way, but they do, in altogether too many cases, forget their Bibles. Is it because they have so fed themselves up the rest of the year that they can omit spiritual nourishment for a while and not miss it? Or is it because they have gone without bread so long that they have lost their liking for it, or all sense of their need of it?

Presumably the latter. And in consequence, as young people who indulge too freely in iced drinks, sodas, sundaes, or late suppers—all too frequent a form of summer dissipation—come back with a good case of gastritis, or typhoid, or neuritis on their hands, so these Christians return in poorer spiritual condition than when they went, and that, any one knows, is saying little.

And it is not the worldly and gay alone who forget to take bread with them. Some of our most zealous Christian people are quite as likely to commit this error. They live on convention talk all the summer and this is little better than café frappé, delicious to taste and mildly stimulating at the time, but terribly hard on the digestion, especially if one takes too much of it.

Or, if they are unfortunate enough—perhaps I might rather say, if they are fortunate enough—not to get to a conference or a camp meeting, they adopt the regimen of special preaching and go the rounds to hear the noted preachers. No day is too hot, no distance too great, for such a qu but they wouldn't think of spending a half-h reading the Bible. They have no taste for Their spiritual palate has become abnormal. K used to pepper his wine to make it more rel able. These Christians must have their spiri food specially seasoned, or they do not enjoy it.

Feast of Good Things

IS IT any wonder that such people are irregu diners at their church's table, their places th more often vacant than filled? Need it surprise preachers if, when we refuse to be sensational to descend to buffoonery in the pulpit, our mi trations have no attraction for them? And can look for them to return in the fall with a religi experience that will prove either wholesome serviceable among their fellow members?

Sadly made aware of this tendency and temp tion among religious people, I want to warn against forgetting your Bibles. Try leaving y devotional books at home; let your Book of Pray go unpacked; fail to have your religious paper addressed; but put in your Bible and get a good meal out of it every day. It will keep you f Sabbath-breaking, inconsistent living and religi delinquency, and its positive outcome will app in a developed prayer-life, a deeper consecratio more ardent religious zeal and a genuine, sponta ous concern for souls.

Did you ever know a man to spend an h Sunday morning with his Bible, and then take train into the country or go out and play golf never did. Did you ever know a woman to tak meal at the Lord's Table early Sunday morn and then stay away from church with the exc that going to church was not necessary? I ne did. Did you ever know a Christian to live his Bible and neglect to speak to others about th souls? I never did. No, I never knew a Christ who got a meal a day at the Bible board, to gan for money, or spend his time hanging around a or keeping company with society's smart set. there is no substitute for bread, there is none the Bible, summer or winter.

Some people are going to be ruined by this s mer's experience. They will give up their fa bid farewell to their religious traditions, withd their allegiance from the church and drop to lo moral levels. And in every case it will be th who forget to take bread, while those who rem bered to carry their Bibles with them and part regularly of the fare they furnish will lay up g stores of spiritual vigor that will prove equal to drain and the strain of the year ahead.

"What are you going to do this year?" I as a parishioner the other day, and what do you th his answer was? "I'm going through my N Testament with fresh and studious interest." there any question as to the kind of a summer has spent? The New Testament will go thro him and people will know it and feel it when gets back.

DENOMINATIONAL NEWS FROM THE FIELD

[illegible] Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has yet received the following cable from Dr. Vaughan: "Japanese occupy Weihsien. Communication by mail interrupted. Mission unmolested." A letter from Weihsien of recent date says:

"Our Christians are full of fervent feelings of war. Every mail brings in Weihsien city crowded to the limit with Christian refugees. Our hospital in Tsingtau and the orphanage of fatherless there must look out for arrows and the soldiers, but the medical work will be [illegible]. Already Dr. Ross has been asked to treat the Red Cross men from Tsingtau. Years of faithful service by the physicians of the Presbyterian hospital in the past, and the opening by Dr. Ross of the Clinton A. Wenner Memorial Dispensary in the west end of the residential district, has at last made a way to Confucius for the missionaries on the part of the population, in place of open hatred accompanied by dangerous threats."

—THAT HUNDREDS of thousands of people in Italy have given up eating meat because they cannot afford to buy it, is declared by Dr. Walling Clark of the Methodist Episcopal Mission in Rome, who has just reached the United States.

"In spite of Italy's neutrality in the European War," says Dr. Clark, "commercial and industrial activities throughout the land are paralyzed. Factories are closed. Printing houses have reduced their force by one-half. This means that vast numbers of men have been thrown out of employment. For a few months these out-of-workers can get along by relying upon their savings. But the outlook for the coming winter is most distressing. Moreover, many thousands of Italians are returning to their native land from Austria, Germany, Switzerland, Belgium, France, England and South America. As yet comparatively few have come back from the United States. These men are absolutely without means of support, and must look to charity for their daily bread."

THE AMERICAN BOARD, as to immediate conditions, has this to say: "For some time after hostilities opened we received but few letters from our foreign force. Foreign exchanges broke down, banks and brokers were unable to send money. Banks in Constantinople and Smyrna, for instance, would allow the mission treasurers to draw only small sums from the mission's own deposits. In the emergency, the Standard Oil Company has agreed to transmit the funds of missionary societies which find themselves unable to make the usual arrangements.

"The missions in Turkey have probably suffered the l They were unable to get money of any amount. Their n Christians and assistants in school and parish work are c to the colors; Turkish soldiers have been quartered on mi premises. Many schools cannot open, as teachers and older gents are drafted and poverty prohibits payment of even small tuition necessary." Rev. George E. White, preside Anatolia College, Asiatic Turkey, writes the Board:

"People are dying of hunger. Requisitions are in proces nearly every necessity of life. Thousands of sheep have swept in from the villages, hundreds of cows taken from city. Flour, sugar, salt, cloth, etc., are taken in tremer quantities. The search for weapons is expected soon, an Christians are not likely to give up such weapons as they If not, serious results may result." Rev. H. M. Irwin, of T in the interior, informs the Board as follows: "The govern is seizing not only horses, but every kind of cattle, provi from the houses and flour from the threshing floors. Hig robbery is on the increase. It is maddening, but what ca do?"

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, BASED ON THE WORDS OF JESUS

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

UNDAY, November 1. Mark 9: 33. "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the y?" Apologists of the Christian religion have htly pointed out that the holy writers have im- rtially recorded facts which were humiliating to mselves. From a human point of view, this fea- e of the Bible narrative certainly adds to its dibility. But a greater purpose than to confirm writers' reputation for veracity is connected h these records of the disciples' folly. These ords serve as mirrors to our own faults. While Lord was thinking of his deepest degradation, disciples' minds were busy with thoughts of rldly greatness. While he was thinking of self- render, they were thinking of self-assertion. o of them was to be the greatest in the millennial gdom of the Messiah which the vivid imagina- n of the Jews was fondly picturing to devout ws as the hope of Israel? Over the question of eferment they had been wrangling with one an- er on the journey to Capernaum. How little epared were they for citizenship even in such a gdom as they were dreaming about! For to lge from present occurrences life in that king- n would have been filled with jealousies, strife, l envying. The Lord surprises them by his owledge of their silly controversy. He who in the s of his flesh read the thoughts of men is the dis- ner of the intents of every heart. The exalted rist is now seeing what is going on in the hearts every disciple.

ONDAY, November 2. Mark 9: 35. "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of and servant of all." The Lord had "sat down l called the twelve" when he uttered these words. e a teacher he had summoned his class and was w delivering, with every mark of authority, a ndamental lesson of the faith which he had been ching them, but which they had not grasped. ne have understood these words of Christ as a tement of what will happen to a person who ambitious. He will come to grief, for God re- teth the proud. In that case, our text would be rely another version of the true saying: Pride th before a fall. While this is true in itself, the borate proceedings which follow immediately er this text constrain us to understand this text, as warning against ambition, but as teaching ristians the way to true greatness, as the Mas- views it. Greatness comes to men by conquest. rise to mastery by subduing obstacles and over- ning enemies. In the Lord's estimation, nobody a conqueror until he has learnt to conquer him- f. Not he is truly great who desires to see others ow him, but who is willing to take the lowest ce. Not he is a true master of men who can ke others serve him, but who makes himself serve ers. Such a person is great in love, great in dom, great in power. The merely ambitious are at moral weaklings, and carry the elements of ir own undoing in their unsubdued carnal hearts. ery little praise and preferment which they gain poison to them, for it feeds only the old, jealous am in them. When a person has learnt to forget iself and his personal interests, he becomes truly at. For God uses such a person as an instru- nt of his power, and for his glory.

UESDAY, November 3. Matthew 18: 3, 4. "Verily, I say unto you, Except ye be converted, become as little children, ye shall not enter into kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall mble himself as this little child, the same is the atest in the kingdom of heaven." With a child his arms, so Mark tells us, the Lord uttered se words. His words contain a statement and illustration. Their recent rivalry had revealed state of heart in the disciples that made them fit for Christ's kingdom. From the pride and ambition, the self-seeking and self-assertion, which had been the dominant element in their recent conversation on the way, they must turn to an altogether different state of mind. Their mind was worldly. Aristotle would have received them into his state, for he inculcated self-aggrandizement. But for the kingdom which Christ wants to set up among men, the docile, submissive, trustful mind of a child who relies on his guides and supporters in all that he does, is an indispensable requisite. What nature has made the child, the disciple must become by divine grace, or the door of the kingdom of Christ will forever remain closed to him. During the centuries of her existence on earth the church has suffered greatly through the self-seeking, ambition, and general worldliness of so-called "princes of the church," who employed the goodly name of the lowly Christ for setting up their Antichristian hierarchy over men. Let us remember that such men have never made a beginning of being Christians; they have not even entered the kingdom.

WEDNESDAY, November 4. Matthew 18: 5. "And whosoever shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me." Worldly greatness seeks alliances with those who are great in the world's estimation, and with their aid strives to rise to distinction. Also in the church such secular alliances have been sought. But in Christ's estimate, the millionaire's gold and the favor of princes are poor instruments for the upbuilding of his kingdom. He is a master-builder in Christ's kingdom who starts among the lowliest member of the human family. The term "receiving" in our text embraces more than material help, such as food, clothing, shelter, etc., which Christians provide for children, especially for the abandoned, in homes and orphanages. It is by bestowing spiritual help and support on the young, by teaching them the divine truth, encouraging them in holiness, that Christians as Christians "receive" children. Any worldly person can do the other things. The rearing of children in Christian homes and schools in the nurture and admonition of the Lord is a very self-denying task, which Christ lays upon his followers, but it is one of the most noble which they can achieve. Christ counts any service rendered a child as rendered directly to himself. In the helplessness and ignorance of the untutored children, the Redeemer himself stands before his followers and says: Will you not give me your Christian care? Serving children as Christ would have them served may not look great, according to the standards by which the world measures greatness, but in the eyes of the Lord such service entitles him who renders it to the highest rank in his kingdom.

THURSDAY, November 5. Matthew 18: 6, 7. "But whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea. Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe unto that man by whom the offense cometh!" Our Lord dearly esteems and cordially cherishes the members of his kingdom. These little ones who believe in him, Christian children and all Christians who, like children, trustfully rely on his grace to teach, guide and support them at all times, are objects of our Lord's tenderest affection. With extreme agitation, therefore, he views those influences in the world which will make his simple Christians stumble in their faith. He denounces woe and damnation to offenders, that is, to persons who hinder the faith of others by their outspoken unbelief and their wicked examples. Simple people are easily influenced. If wicked men employ their influence to make believers follow them in their wickedness, or to shake their confidence in the truth and righteousness which they have embraced, they become an offense to the members of Christ's kingdom. Such offenses are unavoidable in the present state of mankind. The world lieth wholly in wickedness. Evil men and seducers are ever abroad. In the world the disciples have tribulation. But terrible will be the reckoning to which offenders of the faith of Christ's little ones will be called. To receive capital punishment by drowning and to be deprived of a decent burial was regarded as extremely shameful by the ancients. But even this terrible fate is a light affliction in comparison to the terrors which will afflict the offenders in eternity.

FRIDAY, November 6. Mark 9: 43-48. "And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." The hand that offends is a hand that does an offensive thing. The foot that offends is a foot that goes in forbidden paths and takes a sinful step. The eye that offends is an eye that loves to look at offensive things. These useful and necessary limbs can become the instruments of sinning, or sin may enter the heart through their instrumentality. If so, their true mission to man is ended. So appalling are the consequences of sin, that a person should be glad to lose a hand, a foot, or an eye, in order to save his soul. We have noted on a previous occasion that the Lord does not teach self-mutilation, and that such terms as "cut off" and "pluck out" have a spiritual meaning. Whatever arises in us that induces sinning must be mercilessly suppressed, no matter how great the pleasure or profit is that it may promise. The pain of self-denial and self-mortification, though it may be keen and severe, cannot be compared with the agony caused by the gnawing worm of endless remorse hereafter.

SATURDAY, November 7. Mark 9: 49, 50. "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and have peace one with another." Acts of self-mortification may smart like salt thrown on a bleeding wound, or like the cauterizing iron that enters a sore. But such suffering is wholesome. The "old man" must die that the "new man" may live. These "fiery trials," as Peter calls them, must not affright the Christian. As a sweet-smelling sacrifice to his God and Saviour, the believer must thus be spiritually salted and seasoned. Here is the Scriptural furnace through which Christians must pass in this world. And now the thought of the Lord rises higher still. Christians must not only be spiritually seasoned by affliction, they must not only be salted, but they must also be a salt to the rest of the world, as he told them in the Sermon on the Mount. By their pure teaching and clean living, by their unflinching witness against every form of unrighteousness, they must endeavor to stay corruption in the world. The salt of pure faith and holy affections must be in them. Instead of wrangling among themselves over questions of preferment and honor, they should show by their humility and self-abnegation what our religion really is like: not self-serving, but self-surrender.

-THE "FAREWELL SERVICES" to the newly-appointed foreign sionaries of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society were held he Madison Avenue Church, New York City, on October 8, proved a memorable event. Among the twenty missionaries e two newly wedded couples. Their posts are Burma, As- . South India, Bengal, Orissa, South China, East China, t China, Japan, Congo, Philippine Islands.

TEN CHINESE GIRLS, the first to be sent to the United States be educated under the Boxer Indemnity Fund, arrived in York in September. These girls were selected from the didates who presented themselves by competitive examina- held in English in China. All are Christians; eight are ghters of Chinese pastors. Three are Episcopal girls from St. Mary's Hall, Shanghai, established by the Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions, one of whom stood first in the national examination.

—THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS of the Presbyterian Church has received a letter from its mission in Kamerun, West Africa, under date of July 22 and delayed in transit, saying that the mission conference opened with 145 missionaries, three children and eight babies present. Just prior to the meeting neighboring churches and outposts were summoned to an open-air mass meeting, and 1582 natives attended.

—THE THREE YEARS' CAMPAIGN of Christian Evangelization began in Japan under the auspices of the national committee appointed as a continuation committee of the Interdenominational Conference held in Edinburgh, has been steadily carried on during the last three months. Prominent Japanese clergymen have taken part, and encouraging reports are coming in. Rev. Schuyler S. White, stationed at Tsuyama, informs the Board that the meetings held in that city are the most successful he has ever known. The speakers for the four days included three Methodists, three Congregationalists, one Presbyterian and one Y. M. C. A. leader. Bishop Hiraiwa presided. The speakers came in pairs, each spending a day. A women's meeting, the largest ever known in that city, included girls from the government school and boys from the middle school. Three days later another meeting was held. At the communion services fourteen received baptism; thirty or forty more were on the list of inquirers. It is confidently believed more than two-thirds of the Japanese population will be reached, and that the campaign will leave an indelible impression.

THE LAND OF A MILLION EVICTIONS

APPALLED AT THE SIGHT, EUROPE TURNS TO AMERICA FOR HELP

WHEN Antwerp fell, 500,000 miserable people were added to the hosts already made homeless. Singly, by families, in panic-stricken groups, they fled by every avenue of escape from their beloved city and country. Unable to carry anything worth notice, without money, without food, they started out, trusting that somewhere they should find help, rest, sustenance, safety. In the height of the exodus families were torn apart. Parents became separated from their children, children from each other. Thus to terror was added the agony of a loss beyond repair. And under such weights of woe hundreds and thousands staggered on. Into France, into Holland, across sea into England, they made their pitiful way. Two million from Belgium, it is stated by careful observers. Another million in other parts of the vast war zone have lost all their earthly possessions and are today wanderers in the earth, dependent, like those others, on charity.

A CORRESPONDENT of a London paper tried to describe some of the scenes witnessed by a party of "good Samaritans" who went out along the roads to aid the refugees. They found distracted mothers rushing wildly along carrying their babies, crazed by the horror of their situation. They saw pitiful little groups who had tried to make some sort of shelter for themselves for the night in the woods. About mean little fires of sticks, the remnants of once comfortable families huddled, numb to the bone in the cold mists. Worn-out old men and women and children lay along the way in restless sleep. Still others continued to hurry on, and on, and on. The relief party had provided themselves with great meat sandwiches, which they gave freely to the famished refugees. Like animals these wretched creatures seized the bounty. They wept at the charity thus bestowed. By so small a token of human kindness were they renewed in hope and courage to press on. And so across unhappy Europe tramp her women and little children, while all the world looks on in almost stupefied amazement.

Mr. Frederick R. Coudert, the well-known New York lawyer, tells of the sad plight of the children of France. "They are to be seen," he said, "wandering about the country roads in groups, carrying little bundles, or empty-handed, dazed, weeping, homeless. No one knows how many thousands of them there are. One sees them sometimes, in the actual zone of battle, or just out of it; or worse yet, they have had to witness the horrors of war, even the slaying of a parent.

"It is the custom, when a village or town is to be defended, for the officer in command of the region to order its evacuation, so that the helpless population of women and children may not suffer. But these poor people are not in the habit of leaving their homes and traveling about the country. They do not know where to go. So they put off their departure to the last moment, lingering even when the cannonading has begun, sometimes for days, and then slowly they tear themselves away from their homes, never to see them more. So, in masses of women and children, they simply start out and walk along the road, looking for shelter.

"PEOPLE find these lost and strayed children everywhere," said Mr. Coudert. "I saw women fleeing to Amiens, pushing baby carriages filled with babies, frying-pans, blankets, every conceivable thing, with children clinging to their skirts, and one in the arms!"

The picture of desolation presented by one of these villages in France, where the armies have come and gone, villages which have been captured and recaptured perhaps half a dozen times—such a picture as it presents when the peasants creep back to view their old homes, is given in this extract from a French newspaper:

"Plessis-Placy had once been a little village of fifty houses, but not one was intact. On one hand we saw a cottage cracked by a projectile; on another, one half burned. In one case the projectile had entered by the roof and crashed a hole to the cellar; through this hole half the furnishing had fallen in a heap. In other cottages, clothing and furniture were mixed in piles all over the ravaged house and garden; some houses were still burning slowly. In the streets piles of corpses rotted. The gilded cock on the church vane seemed to view the scene with horror. An old man and woman, husband and wife, stood side by side by their old home, which was slowly burning. They tried to speak to me but their voices stuck in their throats. With arms extended like crosses, all they could say was 'Behold, behold!'"

IN the crowded mail that comes to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the War are many letters from churches and societies, enclosing gifts made by their organizations. We rejoice in the rapid spread of this form of help, for many individuals who do not care to send very small sums are glad to contribute through a general offering. The Methodist Episcopal Sunday School of Upper Saddle River Borough, N. J., writes: "We send this small amount ($5) to be used where most needed in aid of those made widows and orphans by the war. We deeply regret that we are not able to make the amount many times larger."

Remitting $2, the Presbyterian Church at Zion, Mo., writes: "Our prayers go with this small offering that if it is God's will soon the war will be over." The Zion Union Sunday School at Fairbury, Neb., on Peace Sunday made up a gift of $3 and sent it with prayers that "God may touch many hearts to give liberally and may bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD richly in this good work."

FLEEING FROM TERMONDE WITH ALL THEIR EARTHLY POSSESSIONS

Saying that they are "very glad that you have taken up the work of helping the suffering widows and orphans in Europe," the Bethania Church, of Volga, S. D., sends $13.70. A peace collection of $15.30 is sent by the Presbyterian Church at Goshen, N. Y.

"MOTHER, oh, mother, won't you carry me now?"

"Not yet, dear. Little brother is asleep. Hold tight to mother's skirt, and keep running. Pretty soon we can rest." . . .

"There is an awful pain in my side, mother; can't we rest now? And, oh, my feet hurt so. Mother, can't you carry me a little way?"

"There, child, we will walk some, but fast, fast. We must get to some house before dark. Perhaps there will be food; think of that, dear, food. Come, let us run again."

"Mother, I can't run—any—more. Oh, mother, my side—hurts so. Mother—mother—stop! stop! why do you leave me? Oh, my mother, see, I am trying to run . . ."

"Oh, mother—I thought I should never catch you. Oh, how glad I am you fell down. Kiss me, mother, for I feel so glad to get to you again. I won't say anything more about my feet. Come, mother, I will carry brother a little way. Mother, why don't you speak? Have you gone to sleep, mother? . . . Mother, have you gone—to sleep?"

"Don't cry, little brother. See how strong sister has gotten. Take sister's hand, and let us go. No, we must not wake up mother. Poor mother is tired out. These leaves will keep her warm. Come, sister is a woman now, like mother—was. Come, let us run, little brother. Only, hug me once and kiss me, little brother, for I am so tired and lonely. Then we will run."

"Sister can't carry you any more, little brother, but she will hold tight to your hand. See, there is a light down the road. Try to run by sister's side. Maybe there is room for us there. Don't cry any more, little brother; you will have some milk very soon. 'Why do I cry?' do you ask? I was thinking of our mother—asleep by the roadside—little brother. Come, let us run fast."

"Oh, dear little brother, why do you stumble and fall? You do not cry any more. See, I will lie down by you, too. How good it is to rest, little brother! What, asleep?—Asleep, little brother? . . . Oh, dear little brother, who will kiss me good-night now?—for I would go to sleep, too!"

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

The Church's Potency

WE ARE, most of us, apt to be wonderfully wise after the event. Illustration of this kind of belated wisdom can be found in many of the sermons that have been preached in American pulpits since the war began. If we accept the judgment of many of our pastors, we cannot escape the conviction that, had their combined views been made known in time, there might have been no war. They feel that they have too long ignored one of the worst evils in the world, when they should have condemned it unsparingly.

Now the churches, some of them at least, are reviewing the situation to ascertain how they may best fortify their position and prove themselves to be real opponents of war. Some of the ministers (if we may be pardoned for using a military figure) are taking to the trenches, from which vantage ground they are telling the church just what must be done to avert war hereafter. Some have one theory, some another, and hardly any two are precisely alike. Some advocate giving Christianity a political platform, so that in a certain sense the whole religious movement may itself become politicalized, in order that it may leaven the wicked, war-loving domain of world-politics. Others would not go quite so far as to transform the churches of Christ into a political organization, but they turn energetically to mass meetings, parades and public debates. There is yet another class of preachers who think the church should confine itself to teaching the precepts of peace and brotherhood and spreading the doctrines of Jesus, who taught the Gospel of "peace on earth to all men of good will." They see no benefit to be derived from the church going into politics, or adopting a political platform. They hold that Jesus meant what he said when he told his followers: "My kingdom is not of this world . . . else would my servants fight." They believe the church's mission to be a spiritual one, and that when wars come, however much the church may deplore them, it is powerless to prevent them; but they also believe it should pray ceaselessly that men may be brought to see the folly and wickedness of war. And herein lies the real potency of the Christian Church. In the past it has failed to discourage war; in the name of patriotism it has even fanned the flames of strife. It has rejoiced with the victors. And when conscience has pricked it, it has kept silent. Not all in the church have done this and we thank God for the exceptions—for those brave spirits who set their faces like flint against all war. We should like to see the church heartily and unanimously consistent in its love of peace and its antagonism to war.

A Timely Note of Warning

IT WAS a serious if not a startling statement which President Faunce made in a sermon preached at the recent celebration of the founding of Brown University, when he said that "the attractions of a luxury-loving age constitute the greatest possible danger to American education." He classes the automobile with alcohol as a college-demoralizer. While it must be admitted that the spendthrift example set in some colleges by rich men's sons has a demoralizing effect upon the other students, we should be loath to accept the unqualified statement as one of general application. It is true, however, that the tendency is unmistakably as President Faunce has pictured it. Young men, with unwisely liberal allowances, can set a pace for extravagance which is a real offense and discomfort to those who are earnestly preparing themselves for a career. Men who never expect, either by necessity or choice, to enter a profession usually have little serious purpose in college life. They dazzle the poorer students with their costly surroundings, their elegantly furnished quarters and their array of indulgences which others cannot afford, and probably would not even if they could. Regardless of whatever the other qualifications may be, this class is certainly a deterrent to the cause of education.

There are colleges, however—and fortunately they are not few—where no student can play the rôle of the sybarite and where a son of Cræsus is on the same social level with his fellows. There should be more colleges of this kind. We do not believe that the standard of university education is suffering as a whole. It is tending upward. The relation existing between student and teacher is no longer purely formal, but cordial and mutually inspiring. Fraternity life, which has been so much criticized, has proved, under proper control, to be a strong help rather than a hindrance to college advancement; but it is only where the tendency to luxury, intellectual indolence and dissipation has been wisely repressed that fraternities yield the best results.

President Faunce's note of warning, however, will do good. It will fix the attention of our college faculties on conditions which, should they escape detection, would inevitably produce deterioration. The only way is to keep the colleges wholesome, energetic, Spartanlike in their simplicity of life, and infused with a democracy of spirit which makes all equal in the intellectual race.

Swords and Plowshares

SECRETARY BRYAN has given a felicitous touch to the administration's peace treaty program. Of the twenty-nine conventions with different governments, twenty-one have been approved by the Senate and will go into effect as soon as formal ratifications are exchanged. A few days ago, on the occasion of the exchange of ratifications between our government and the representatives of Guatemala, Ecuador and Greece, metal paper-weights in the form of plowshares, made from condemned swords furnished by the War Department, were presented to the ambassadors and ministers. Each of the souvenirs bore, as an inscription, the prophecy from Isaiah 2: 4: "They shall beat their swords into plowshares." All of the swords from which the souvenirs were made had seen service and had drunk the blood of battle. There are doubtless some who will criticize our peace-loving secretary's idealism as eccentric, but the great majority will regard it as an appropriate and by no means ungraceful incident. For their possessors, these unique reminders of the Great Republic's friendship will have a language and meaning all their own. The handles of the swords are retained for distribution among the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

How Far Does Your Faith Go?

PEOPLE are constantly wondering why their prayers are not answered. Multitudes of petitions are ascending to the Lord of heaven, and with the hosts of prayers comes the plaint: "Why are our prayers not answered?"

It is strange how inclined we are to stop short of following Bible directions. The teaching of the Bible is not that we get everything for which we simply ask in prayer. In almost every case where that statement is made it is accompanied by a plain condition. The great word about prayer is faith. One can pray and pray for a boon year after year, but unless with the prayer goes faith, the prayer is unavailing.

It is not what we ask for, but what we believe for, that we get. And this is so because faith takes us all the way through to God himself. Much of the prayer-task is purely mechanical. Certain words are uttered or written, and our confidence, if we are not careful, stops at the speaking or the writing of the words. What we have faith in is our prayer, or our letter, or ourselves, or our friends. If our prayer or our faith goes no farther than that it can produce no results. It is when these prayer-helps lead us through to a definite, vital, positive hold upon God himself that results come from prayer.

Do not give up confidence in prayer because your own has not been answered. Ask yourself how far your faith has gone. Has it touched God? Has it believed that because he loved you and gave himself to die for you, the blessing you ask will come? This is faith. And it is only to prayers accompanied by this kind of faith that we have any right to expect an answer.

Are You Helping Them?

IT WOULD be impossible to conceive a sadder picture than that which is furnished by the correspondents from the zones of suffering and destitution in Europe. Almost all the capitals are filled with swarms of refugees. Neutral Holland has been invaded by nearly half a million of the homeless and destitute from Belgium, and England is receiving them by the tens of thousands. Many of the Dutch towns are so filled with these unfortunates that the streets are said to be impassable. Among them are many mothers who, in the crush have been separated from their children and are half-crazed in consequence. There are little children, too—many of them too small to even give their names—who have lost their parents and do not know whether they are alive or dead. Vienna is filled with the refugees and large numbers have even reached, in their flight, as far as Cyprus. France, in addition to her own multitude of sufferers, has a million of homeless Belgians, principally women and children, to look after. Germany and Russia, too, both have their own sad problems. But there is one cheering side to the picture. It is the splendid way in which the women of the various countries, whose homes the war has spared, have come to the rescue of their unfortunate sisters. They busy themselves in a thousand ways giving comfort and relief. Many tenderly reared ladies are devoting themselves to this work and thousands of poor, destitute creatures, who have fled from the terrors of war, have reason today to bless the kind hearts of those gentle ministers.

Before this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches its readers, our first remittance of $20,000 from the Relief Fund will be on its way to help the widows and orphans. The need is tremendous and we trust that every reader who has not sent in a contribution to the CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund will do so without delay. This is the burden that has been laid upon Christian America, and if every one does his or her share, a great work for humanity will be accomplished.

Comment by the Way

—THE MAN WHO does not live within his income is very likely some day to live without it.

—LITTLE NORWAY HAS just closed its exposition in honor of the hundredth year of its independence. Two hundred thousand visitors were present at the final exercises. The exposition is announced to have been a great financial success.

—NOTWITHSTANDING CONDITIONS IN EUROPE, some of our peace advocates are going on with their own campaign, "making war on war." They do this in a novel manner by the use of illustrated posters bearing such legends as: "Here go good men—needed by their families" (then a picture of troops on the march)—"to kill other men, needed by their families. This is war." Another poster reads: "Here are the poor made poorer and the hungry made more hungry" (here a picture of homeless refugees). "This is war. These homeless ones know what war is." The illustrations are reproductions of actual war photographs. The whole scheme is a design of Mrs. E. Tilton, of Boston, and is a powerful object lesson.

—SOME PAINSTAKING INVESTIGATOR has discovered that Hammurabi, the famous sixth king of the first Babylonian dynasty (and who is believed to be identical with the Amraphel of Gen. 14), was the first temperance advocate on record. He reigned between 1900 B.C. and 2340 B.C., the actual date being somewhat indefinite. Hammurabi was, in a very large sense, the "father of his country," and the record of his achievements as warrior, legislator, temple-builder and religious leader is to on the famous Hammurabi tablet of black diorite dug up by De Morgan at Persepolis in 1902. Now it is claimed that he issued a royal edict against the drinking-places in his pleasure loving capital. This might be termed the original anti-saloon movement. What penalties it imposed or what effect it produced does not seem to be recorded.

—A CONTEMPORARY ADVOCATES the application of Civil Service rules, or their equivalent, to the selection of candidates for ministerial charges and says: "Of all governments for society church government clings closest to the autocratic. Would not our church leaders do well to define what is efficiency in the ministry? For the want of defined standards men as authorities in locating ministers have frequently been misjudged. The sense of democracy and fairness and efficiency is so growing and influencing all conditions, that it is a safe guess that its influence will not only reach the church, but that in some form service in the church will be defined and standards set, and a merit system will be devised." The suggestion is worth considering. A minister in these days, to be successful, must be a man of many parts. But after all, the essential thing is the spiritual. Given the grace of God in his heart, the love of souls and the ability to present the Gospel faithfully and convincingly, and the rest is subordinate.

—IT IS ESTIMATED by Congressman Underwood, leader of the House of Representatives, that our government will lose, through diminished revenue in the next twelve months on account of the war, approximately $125,000,000. He gives these figures as the estimated falling off in import duties: Austro-Hungary, a reduction of $5,267,000; France, $35,566,000; Germany, $38,685,000; Belgium, $5,398,000; Great Britain, $40,563,000; Europe Russia, $242,000. These reductions aggregate over $125,000,000 or substantially the amount of the deficit which the War Revenue Bill passed by the House is designed to cover, although it will scarcely do so. The customs revenues for the fiscal year of 1915 were $26,762,000 below the figures of the previous year, but this was more than compensated by the $40,000,000 from individual income tax and the tax from corporations. Before the war tax measure reaches the final stage, a number of details have to be added. In imposing the tax, which is purely an emergency measure, the government is using care and judgment in placing the burden where it will be most easily borne without disturbance to business and without being unduly oppressive to any class of citizens.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

CONDUCTED BY FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

Seated at left is the late King Edward of England; behind him stands the German Kaiser, next to whom is Queen Mary, then King George, of England; then Alfonso of Spain, and the Kaiserin, wife of the German Emperor. Seated in front of the latter is the Czarina of Russia, to the latter's left, ex-Queen Amelia of Portugal, and between them stands Alexandra, mother of King George.

Pocket Wireless Apparatus Discovered

AMONG the strange discoveries in the field of wireless telegraphy there comes the story of a new device for taking wireless communications that can be carried in the pocket. A despatch to the London Times from Rome says that it is reported from Aquila that a priest named Domenico Argentieri has invented an instrument for receiving wireless messages whereby communications may be received even in closed rooms. No poles or batteries are needed. The apparatus is of the cheapest description. The mysteries of nature being unfolded by scientific investigation and experiment suggest the mysteries of spiritual things revealed by God's Holy Spirit.

Great is the mystery of godliness. God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory. (I Tim. 3: 16.)

Precious Gift of Days

AMONG the notable addresses delivered at the opening of the school year was that of Marion LeRoy Burton, president of Smith College, on "Her Gift of Days," who in part said: "The college says to you: 'Here is my gift of days, days full of opportunity, days swift in the passing, days that will never come back. I give them to you freely; all I ask is that you use these days and do not waste them.' . . . The real reward of work lies in the work itself, not in what one receives for it, whether that compensation be money, or recognition, or fame, or power." These timely words to the young ladies of the college are just as applicable to the older persons who have gotten out into the larger university of practical life. The gift of days has been bestowed not only that the intellect may be cultivated, and the moral faculties developed, but that we may fill the days up with deeds of charity to our fellow men and continuous acts of devoted service for Christ in the building up of his kingdom. Jesus recognized the tragic importance of the gift of days to him, when he said:

I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work. (John 9: 4.)

Work That Women Prefer

CENSUS figures relating to women's occupations in New York City from 1900 to 1910 are interesting. The actresses rose from 2,629 to 3,759; the number of women barbers, hair-dressers and manicures from 850 to 3,864; bookkeepers, cashiers and accountants from 8,290 to 21,613; telegraph and telephone operators from 2,406 to 7,362; milliners from 7,651 to 12,096; dressmakers from 6,437 to 8,751; tobacco operators from 6,437 to 8,751; music teachers from 3,281 to 5,804, and stenographers and typewriters from 10,868 to 33,769. Meanwhile there was a decrease in the number of saleswomen and only a small increase in the number of servants. The American working girl and woman is a good specimen of womanhood and an excellent home-builder. These words can be appropriately applied to her:

Strength and honor are her clothing, and she shall rejoice in time to come. (Prov. 31: 25.)

EUROPE'S ROYAL FAMILY QUARREL

ONE of the saddest and most shocking features of the war in Europe is the fact that some of the chief participants in it are related to each other by family ties. During the time of the late King Edward, there was a reunion of royal families of Europe, a beautiful picture of affection inspiring to the nations represented, and to the whole world at large. Now the members of that royal family are engaged in the bloodiest war of all history, a miserable picture of death to the individual nations represented and of shocking disgrace to all mankind. Blood has not been thicker than water with them. This etiquette calling for exchange of visits at capitals by kings and queens is but an empty form after all; the costly armaments, the pride and lust of power give flat contradiction to the pretense of that affection which is supposed to exist in the normal human heart. It would be well for the rulers of Europe to open the Bible they profess to believe, and read this injunction: "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." (Eph. 4: 32.)

Child Labor Bill Dead

THE so-called Palmer Child Labor Bill in Congress seems to have died a natural death, or rather an unnatural death. Its friends confidently expected its passage at this session of Congress, but it will have to go over to the next session, and with the most favorable progress it could not be passed till a year from this time. State legislatures have taken important action on this subject, and a just Federal law ought to pass, abating the gross abuses of child labor and setting the children free for a better physical, mental and spiritual development. It can be said of the tuition of children by the nation, as by parents:

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it. (Prov. 22: 6.)

Church Union in Canada

THE General Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada recently, in session in Ottawa, discussed the important matter of final organic union with the Congregational and Presbyterian denominations, each of which bodies had already set the matter onward toward consummation. These negotiations for union have been going on for years. Theological obstacles have been overcome and government matters are found to be adjustable. Economic arguments are now at the front. The movement of population within the Dominion constitutes one of the great reasons why church union is needed. The loss of rural population in Ontario is amazing. The rainfall has decreased because of the stripping of the woods. The water of spring freshets is not held back to be distributed through the summer, and streams go dry. The mills and dams along the streams are in ruins, and the lumbermen have had to leave. The decrease of the rainfall and the lack of conservation of the melted winter snow have decreased the productiveness of the fields, and driven many farmers to other parts. Hundreds of thousands of people have left Ontario in the last ten years, and the problem of the rural church has been a fight for a bare subsistence. This has had much to do with the proposition of consolidation. There has been a rapid movement in Canada and in the United States toward the spiritual unity of the members of the various denominations. This proposition of organic unity in Canada is a long step and a wise one.

Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one, as we are. (John 17: 11.)

Cruelty to Animals Punished

IN THE court of a large city the other day a man was arraigned for the cruel treatment of the horses he was driving. The judge said: "It is an outrageous cruelty to drive a pair of horses cut and scarred like that. I am going to give you the heaviest sentence of the law, thirty days in the workhouse." Here were horses hitched to a load already too heavy for them, and then they were cut with the lash till the blood came because they did not go faster, or make better time going uphill. It is a shame, a crime, to cruelly treat a trusty horse, who asks no pay at all, only the corn that rattles in the trough or hay that rustles in the rack, and works all day loyally from morning to night. The horses did not get what was coming to them, but in the jail sentence the man got what was due him.

A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. (Prov. 12: 10.)

Wife Clings to Leper Husband

A WIFE the other day persuaded the health authorities in her city to let her go back and live with her husband, who is stricken with leprosy and confined to their home. The wife obeyed the order at first taking her from her husband, but her love for the stricken man was too strong and she pleaded to be permitted to return to his side. She pleaded that she was the only one to give him the comforts needed, and that she would smooth his pathway to the tomb and risk following him to it from the same disease, rather than leave him alone or live without him. Every community has numbers of wives who give up their lives to the care of invalid husbands, and of husbands whose chief concern is to nurse and comfort their afflicted wives. There can be no heroism on the battlefield greater than that of the woman whose beautiful, loyal love would not allow her to be torn away from the idol of her heart, though she risked infection and a slow death from a loathsome disease. The affection of this woman calls these words to mind:

Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned. (Solomon's Song 8: 7.)

A WEEK IN THE WORLD'S NEWS

WHERE THE WEATHER BUREAU IS INFALLIBLE. Whatever errors are made by this excellent Federal institution in forecasting weather conditions, its statements as to what the conditions were on any past date or dates may be accepted without question. Therefore it is refreshing, in the midst of what every one thought was the driest year in history, to learn that four of the last ten years were decidedly dryer, viz.: 1912, 1910 (a record breaker), 1908 and 1907. October figures as a dry month in most of the ten years.

CONVENTION OF LIFE AND LIMB SAVERS. The earnest men and women who have set out to reduce the accident figures of this country by making safety first a sixth sense, met in Chicago in October, and rejoiced over the fact that a fifty per cent. cut had already been made. All large railroads, industrial plants and manufacturing concerns and many small ones have adoped the safety first principle and installed practical methods for its observance, upwards of a million workers now enjoying safeguards suggested by the National Council of Industrial Safety and kindred organizations. Not so long ago the statistics showed an average of 25,000 deaths resulting from 2,000,000 industrial accidents yearly, according to the experts, street and other accidents not being included in this huge total.

TO WASH OUR HANDS OF CROWNS. Declaring it to be "our voluntary withdrawal of sovereignty over another people," the House, on October 14, by a vote of 211 to 59, passed the administration Philippine bill providing for a more liberal government in the islands, and declaring it to be the purpose of the United States to recognize their independence immediately the Filipinos establish a stable government. The bill has been hotly opposed by those who favor the permanent retention of the islands. It is not expected that the Senate will take up the measure at the present session. Such a relinquishment of territorial and political rights, if consummated, will be the first instance of the kind on record.

ASK FOR A $33,000,000 RAISE IN PAY. This startling request will be preferred by the 65,000 engineers, firemen and others employed by the ninety-eight railroads operating west of Chicago, when the arbitration board, appointed as an outcome of President Wilson's friendly intervention at the time of the threatened strike last August, convenes in Chicago November 9. The board is composed of two representatives each of the employees and the roads, and two neutrals, appointed under the provisions of the Newlands act.

LANDLOCKED IN PANAMA CANAL. A number of ships en route through the Panama Canal have been stopped in their passage and all traffic closed by a new slide in Culebra Cut, which occurred late on October 14. An immediate examination by Colonel Goethals led to belief that the damage could be remedied in a few days. Dredges at once went to work at the mass of rock and mud which nearly fills the channel. This has been the most troublesome spot in the great waterway, and future slides are not impossible.

TO SPEND $18,000,000 TO GET TO BROOKLYN. On October 13 Mayor Mitchel of New York and a distinguished company inaugurated the digging of the new $18,000,000 East River tunnel, the contract for which has been awarded to the Flinn-O Rourke Company of Pittsburg, the new tube to complete the dual subway system between Manhattan and Brooklyn. This is a record municipal contract, and has the added novelty of having been given to contractors of another than the city paying the bills. Speeches, the turning up of a few spadefuls of earth, and mutual felicitations marked the ceremonies.

THE MEXICAN QUESTION AGAIN SETTLED. At a military convention held in Aguas Calientes, Mexico, October 14, General L. Villareal, president of the convention, was nominated for provisional president, the resignation of General Carranza as de facto head of the present government having been presented to the convention. The new nominee for this much disputed post is at present governor of the State of Nuevo Leon, by appointment of Carranza, and is also the choice of General Villa for the presidency, and seemingly has the backing of Zapata, the continuous revolutionist who has been making demonstrations in a suburb of Mexico City to the great terror of the inhabitants. News despatches forecast the certain election of Villareal, which is declared to be a complete victory for Villa and his party. He is not, however, without friends among the followers of Carranza. The new nominee is described as a man of high ability and able to establish peace and bring about prosperity in Mexico. Later reports deny the acceptance of Carranza's resignation and the nomination of Villareal. Otherwise the news stands as correct.

DOCTORS AT LAST CATCH UP WITH A POPULAR IDEA. The belief has long been held by unscientific parents that soiled school-books used by successive generations as long as the print can be seen are the equal of any public drinking cup as a germ carrier; and that searching medical examinations of pupils for evidences of germ-guilt acquired at home are apt to be nullified by the books supplied to those same pupils by the school. Philadelphia has taken the same view of the matter, and the Board of Education has ruled out much-handled text books by advice of the health authorities. Books concerning which any doubt can exist are to be burned forthwith. It is estimated that this precautionary measure will cost the city $100,000 a year.

TO TRY THE SARAJEVO CONSPIRATORS. The trial of Gavrio Prinzip, the assassin of the Austrian Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife, whose crime precipitated the conflict in Europe, was begun October 13. The assassin and twenty-one accomplices are charged with high treason besides murder. The activities of a political society whose objective is a Greater Servia are included in the indictment. The town of Sarajevo, Bosnia, where the trial takes place, is said to be practically in a state of siege as a precautionary measure, police and garrison being prepared for any emergency. The population is said to be in a state of terror because of the possibilities of violent measures in behalf of the prisoner, who boasts of his deed as being not a crime but an act of the highest patriotism.

THE MISSISSIPPI RE-DISCOVERED.. Although it has been where it is now for a number of years, the Mississippi River has just been used for the first time to transport lumber from Louisiana to Chicago, according to a news despatch, sixty car-loads from Jeffries arriving via the Illinois and Michigan Canal at Chicago, October 13. The barges were towed up the river to La Salle, and there transferred to steel canal boats to go through the locks, the trip taking a little longer than by rail and costing about 25 per cent. less.

BRAZIL BUSINESS INTERESTS HARD HIT BY THE WAR. News reports from Portland, Me., state that the Federal Court has appointed receivers for the Brazil Railway Company, organized under the laws of Maine in 1906, and having an authorized capital of $60,000,000, of which nearly all is outstanding, because of the inability of the road to meet its interest payments on an indebtedness of above $118,000,000, its condition being due to the prostration of Brazilian business and the failure of the government of Brazil to pay $10,000,000 due the company and its subsidiaries. This railway system controls 5,000 miles of road, and is financed almost wholly by foreign capital.

STEAMER SINKS IN NEW YORK HARBOR. By promptly racing his vessel full speed into a bank of the Ambrose Channel after she was rammed in a fog by the 8,000-ton freighter Iowan of the Hawaiian-American Line, the captain of the 5,000-ton United Fruit Company steamship Metapan saved the 186 lives aboard, 76 of whom were passengers. The accident occurred early in the morning of October 15, and the damaged ship, which had been badly gored below the water line just aft of the bow and was rapidly filling, plunged into the Channel's bank only in the nick of time. The passengers got away in lowered boats, and were picked up by the steamships and tugs summoned by wireless. The excellent discipline of the officers and crew was aided by the singing of the popular air "It's a Long Way to Tiperary" by a number of British reservists, according to the reports.

BANKED FIRES GRIEVE COAL MEN, but not inconsolably. In fact, the news organ of the trade sees both the cloud and its silver lining at once, as witness this statement: "Market conditions in coal are such as to discourage the operators along almost every line. . . . The very excess of depression now is encouraging in that it indicates the climax of our business reaction." Factories running only at 40 to 50 per cent. of their capacity, common carriers handling less freight, export orders falling off, all these contribute to the worries of the coalmen. Approaching winter with its increased demands plus better business conditions as the country gets adjusted to the world-change through which we are passing, keep hope alive in their breasts.

SIMPLE ARITHMETIC TO SELL APPLES. "There are 800,000 families in Massachusetts. If every householder will take advantage of the low prices and buy a barrel of apples today, the entire apple crop of the State would be taken care of." Thus runs an appeal of the State Board of Agriculture in a laudable effort to aid the apple-growers who are in danger of losing most of their crop by spoiling, through lack of a market, and so will be compelled to charge outrageous prices later on for the few apples that will be left. The Buy-a-Barrel-of-Apples campaign, while not strictly original in its idea, may prove a huge success in Massachusetts, and spread to other States and commodities. But more than one church officer can enlighten the promoters of such plans on the reliability of arithmetic as applied to possible financial returns.

DEATH TRANSFERS A SCEPTER. King Charles of Rumania died on October 10, at the age of 75, having ruled from 1881, when he became the first king of that country, over which, by international decree, he had ruled as Prince Charles of Hohenzollern. His wife was the Princess Elizabeth, "Carmen Sylva." He was succeeded by his nephew, Ferdinand of Rumania, who took the oath of office on Sunday, October 11. The attitude of Rumania in the present war has given concern to the Powers, and belief is expressed that the death of the late king, who had insisted upon neutrality, may result in Rumania's taking the field on the side of the Allies of the Triple Entente. Russia is reported as so regarding the possibilities. The wife of the new king is an English-born daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, second son of Queen Victoria.

PROVING IT CANNOT BE DONE. Possibly with an ambition to demonstrate that great cathedrals in Europe cannot possibly have been as badly damaged in the war as some news despatches depict, an unknown man on October 14 placed a dynamite bomb at the base of one of the pillars in the nave of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, and the explosion which followed did considerable damage of an unimportant character. A second bomb was also placed in the Roman Catholic Church of St. Alphonsus, downtown, and achieved a similar success for the demonstrator, if we have rightly guessed his object. In the opinion of church officials and the police, however, the act was that of a demented individual. The bomb placed in the cathedral was highly charged, and capable of wrecking an ordinary building.

COME, BIRDIE, COME, AND LIVE WITH ME. The National Association of Audubon Societies wishes this to become the national song for a while, in order that every property owner may have more birds working for him against insect and other pests, and also growing up, in some cases, into Thanksgiving dinners. To this end the society will issue bulletins to aid in the building of bird houses and feeding devices, and also to explain the secrets of turkey, duck and quail raising.

NEWS IN THE MAKING. Only $88,884,400 in gold was mined in the United States in 1913, or a little less than a dollar per capita.—The bill providing for the leasing of Alaskan coal lands has been held up over the present Congress.—On October 11 a twenty-ton boulder fell from a precipice, and crushed a day coach and smoker of a Denver-Rio Grande train east of Grand Junction, Col., killing three persons and injuring many others.—The United States Commission of Rural Credits is reported as considering drastic reorganization of the farm mortgage business in protection of the borrowers.—Secretary Bryan has signed tentative peace treaties with Ecuador and Greece, containing the provision for a one year's truce in all disputes.—One of the first propositions to go before the Federal Reserve Board may be that of organizing an International Credit Bureau to act as a clearing house for the liquidation of international financial obligations with a minimum of gold intershipment.
